Leave to appeal to the Ontario Court of Appeal was granted on the basis that Sharpe J.'s decision that he was disqualified from determining the question of jurisdiction was a judgment from which an appeal lay under s. 114 of the Provincial Offences Act. At the hearing of the appeal the Court of Appeal ruled that the appeal should proceed on the basis that Sharpe J. had in effect decided that as a matter of law the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) as an institution was not independent.

L'autorisation d'interjeter appel à la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a été accordée pour le motif que la décision du juge Sharpe, qu'il ne pouvait statuer sur la question de compétence, constituait un jugement dont appel pouvait être interjeté en vertu de l'art. 114 de la Loi sur les infractions provinciales. À l'audition de l'appel, la Cour d'appel a décidé que l'appel devait être fondé sur le fait que le juge Sharpe avait en réalité décidé qu'aux yeux du droit la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), en tant qu'institution, n'était pas indépendante.

The unanimous judgment of the five-member Court of Appeal (Howland C.J.O., MacKinnon A.C.J.O., Dubin, Martin and Weatherston JJ.A.), L'arrêt unanime de la formation de cinq membres de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (le juge en chef Howland, le juge en chef adjoint MacKinnon reported at R. v. Valente (No. 2) (1983), 2 C.C.C. (3d) 417, was delivered by Howland C.J.O., who, after a comprehensive consideration of the issues, concluded at p. 444 as follows:

I have reached the conclusion that the concerns raised by the counsel for the respondent neither singly nor collectively would result in a reasonable apprehension that they would impair the ability of Judge Sharpe to make an independent and impartial adjudication. In my opinion, the provincial court in this province is as a matter of law an independent tribunal. Judge Sharpe sitting as a member of the court was independent, and as has been noted earlier, he was impartial. Therefore, the respondent appeared before an independent and impartial tribunal within the Charter.

Accordingly, the appeal is allowed. The purported judgment of Judge Sharpe that the provincial court (criminal division) as an institution is not an independent tribunal is set aside and the matter is remitted to Judge Sharpe to determine whether the sentence imposed was a fit and proper sentence.

On the appeal to this Court the constitutional question was framed as follows:

Is a judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) of Ontario, appointed pursuant to the provisions of the Provincial Courts Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 398, an independent and impartial tribunal within the meaning of the Constitution Act, 1982?

Although the decision of Sharpe J. was treated as a judgment that the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) as an institution was not an independent tribunal and it was that judgment that was found by the Court of Appeal to be in error and was set aside, the Court of Appeal, as the conclusions in its reasons for judgment indicate, necessarily had to consider the independence of Sharpe J. The tribunal, for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter, was Sharpe J. sitting as the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) for the Judicial District of Halton. The independence of Sharpe J. for purposes of the issue in the appeal is to be determined with reference to the relevant statutory provisions and regulations that were in force at the time he declined jurisdiction on December 16, 1982. Subsequent changes in the law governing the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) and its judges are relevant to the question of the continuing inde-et les juges Dubin, Martin et Weatherston), publié à R. v. Valente (No. 2) (1983), 2 C.C.C. (3d) 417, a été rendu par le juge en chef Howland qui, après un examen approfondi des points litigieux, conclut ceci à la p. 444:

[TRADUCTION] Je suis arrivé à la conclusion que les préoccupations des avocats de l'intimé, ni individuellement ni collectivement, ne permettent pas raisonnablement de craindre qu'il y ait atteinte à la capacité du juge Sharpe de statuer en toute indépendance et impartialité. À mon avis, la Cour provinciale de notre province est, aux yeux du droit, un tribunal indépendant. Le juge Sharpe, siégeant comme membre de la cour, était indépendant et, comme on l'a déjà dit, impartial. Donc l'intimé a comparu devant un tribunal indépendant et impartial au sens de la Charte.

En conséquence, l'appel est accueilli. Le prétendu jugement du juge Sharpe, portant que la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), en tant qu'institution, n'est pas un tribunal indépendant, est annulé et l'affaire lui est renvoyée pour qu'il statue sur la régularité et l'à-propos de la peine infligée.

Dans le pourvoi devant cette Cour, la question constitutionnelle a été formulée ainsi:

Un juge de la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) de l'Ontario, nommé conformément aux dispositions de la Loi sur les cours provinciales L.R.O. 1980, chap. 398, constitue-t-il un tribunal indépendant et impartial au sens de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Bien que la décision du juge Sharpe ait été considérée comme un jugement portant que la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), en tant qu'institution, n'était pas un tribunal indépendant et que ce soit ce jugement que la Cour d'appel a jugé erroné et a annulé, la Cour d'appel, comme l'indiquent les conclusions de ses motifs de jugement, devait nécessairement examiner si le juge Sharpe lui-même était indépendant. Le tribunal, pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, était le juge Sharpe siégeant en Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) du district judiciaire de Halton. L'indépendance du juge Sharpe pour les fins du pourvoi doit être établie en fonction des dispositions législatives et réglementaires pertinentes en vigueur au moment où il a décliné compétence, le 16 décembre 1982. Les changements subséquents apportés au droit régissant la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) et ses juges sont pertinents en ce qui pendence of the tribunal to which the matter must be remitted for determination of this Court agrees with the Court of Appeal that Sharpe J. sitting as the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) was an independent tribunal when he declined jurisdiction.

II

The first question in the appeal is whether the Court of Appeal adopted the proper test for determining whether a tribunal is independent within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter. The test applied was the one for reasonable apprehension of bias, adapted to the requirement of independence. Noting that in Re Evans and Milton (1979), 46 C.C.C. (2d) 129, a case involving a question of bias, the Ontario Court of Appeal has adopted the test for reasonable apprehension of bias expressed by de Grandpré J. in Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369, Howland C.J.O. held that this was the proper test to be applied in determining whether a tribunal is an independent tribunal.

The test for reasonable apprehension of bias was put by de Grandpré J. at p. 394 as follows:

> ... the apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. In the words of the Court of Appeal, that test is "what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically — and having thought the matter through — concluded . . . . "

As adapted to the requirement of an independent tribunal and to the issues in the appeal the test was stated by Howland C.J.O., at pp. 439-40 as follows:

> The question that now has to be determined is whether a reasonable person, who was informed of the relevant statutory provisions, their historical background and the traditions surrounding them, after viewing the matter realistically and practically would conclude that a provincial court judge sitting as Judge Sharpe was to hear the appeal in this case was a tribunal which could make an independent and impartial adjudication. In answering concerne la question de l'indépendance permanente du tribunal auquel l'affaire doit être renvoyée si cette Cour est d'accord avec la Cour d'appel pour dire que le juge Sharpe, siégeant en Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), constituait un tribunal indépendant lorsqu'il a décliné compétence.

II

La première question qui se pose dans ce pourvoi est de savoir si la Cour d'appel a adopté le bon critère pour déterminer si un tribunal est indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Le critère appliqué a été celui de la crainte raisonnable de partialité, adapté à l'exigence d'indépendance. Faisant remarquer que dans l'affaire Re Evans and Milton (1979), 46 C.C.C. (2d) 129, où il était question de partialité, la Cour d'appel d'Ontario a adopté le critère de la crainte raisonnable de partialité formulé par le juge de Grandpré dans l'arrêt Committee for Justice and Liberty c. Office national de l'énergie, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 369, le juge en chef Howland de l'Ontario a jugé que c'était là le critère qu'il fallait appliquer pour décider si un tribunal est un tribunal indépendant.

Le critère de la crainte raisonnable de partialité est énoncé ainsi par le juge de Grandpré, à la p. 394:

> ... la crainte de partialité doit être raisonnable et le fait d'une personne sensée et raisonnable qui se poserait elle-même la question et prendrait les renseignements nécessaires à ce sujet. Selon les termes de la Cour d'appel, ce critère consiste à se demander «à quelle conclusion en arriverait une personne bien renseignée qui étudierait la question en profondeur, de façon réaliste et pratique. . .»

L'adaptant à l'exigence d'un tribunal indépendant et aux questions en litige dans cet appel, le juge en chef Howland énonce ainsi le critère aux pp. 439 et 440:

this question it is necessary to review once again the specific concerns which were raised before Judge Sharpe and then conclude whether singly or collectively they would raise a reasonable apprehension that the tribunal was not independent and impartial so far as its adjudication was concerned.

In his reasons for judgment, Howland C.J.O. generally referred, as does the constitutional question, to the double requirement of an "independent and impartial tribunal". He made it clear, however, at one point in his reasons that there was no question of Sharpe J.'s impartiality, and that the sole issue was whether he, as a judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division), was an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter. On this point he said at p. 423:

> It will be noted that both the Charter and the Bill of Rights refer to an "independent and impartial tribunal". In this appeal the Court is only concerned with the independence of the tribunal and not with its impartiality or freedom from bias except in so far as it affects that independence. There was no suggestion that Judge Sharpe was in any way biased, and therefore not impartial. A judge may be impartial in the sense that he has no preconceived ideas or bias, actual or perceived, without necessarily being independent.

The issue is whether the test applied by the Court of Appeal, clearly appropriate, because of its derivation, to the requirement of impartiality, is an appropriate and sufficient test for the requirement of independence. Although there is obviously a close relationship between independence and impartiality, they are nevertheless separate and distinct values or requirements. Impartiality refers to a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case. The word "impartial" as Howland C.J.O. noted, connotes absence of bias, actual or perceived. The word "independent" in s. 11(d) reflects or embodies the traditional constitutional value of judicial independence. As such, it connotes not merely a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions, but a status or relationship to others, particularly to the executive branch of government, that rests on objective conditions or guarantees.

impartialité. Pour répondre à cette question, il est nécessaire d'examiner une fois de plus les préoccupations spécifiques exprimées devant le juge Sharpe, puis de décider si, prises individuellement ou collectivement, elles soulèvent une crainte raisonnable que le tribunal n'ait pas été indépendant et impartial pour rendre jugement.

Dans ses motifs de jugement, le juge en chef Howland mentionne, comme le fait la question constitutionnelle, la double exigence d'un «tribunal indépendant et impartial». Cependant, il dit clairement, en un point de ses motifs, que l'impartialité du juge Sharpe n'est pas en cause et que la seule question qui se pose est de savoir si, en tant que juge de la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), il constituait un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Sur ce point, il affirme à la p. 423:

> [TRADUCTION] On notera que la Charte, tout comme la Déclaration des droits, parle d'un «tribunal indépendant et impartial». Dans le présent appel, la cour n'a à se préoccuper que de l'indépendance du tribunal et non de son impartialité, ou du fait qu'il soit exempt de toute partialité dans la mesure où cela influe sur cette indépendance. On n'a pas prétendu que le juge Sharpe avait un préjugé quelconque et qu'il n'était donc pas impartial. Un juge peut être impartial, en ce sens qu'il n'a aucun préjugé ou idée préconçue, réels ou apparents, sans nécessairement être indépendant.

Il s'agit de savoir si le critère appliqué par la Cour d'appel, qui de par son origine convenait à l'exigence d'impartialité, constitue un critère suffisant et approprié en ce qui concerne l'exigence d'indépendance. Même s'il existe de toute évidence un rapport étroit entre l'indépendance et l'impartialité, ce sont néanmoins des valeurs ou exigences séparées et distinctes. L'impartialité désigne un état d'esprit ou une attitude du tribunal vis-à-vis des points en litige et des parties dans une instance donnée. Le terme «impartial», comme l'a souligné le juge en chef Howland, connote une absence de préjugé, réel ou apparent. Le terme «indépendant», à l'al. 11*d*), reflète ou renferme la valeur constitutionnelle traditionnelle qu'est l'indépendance judiciaire. Comme tel, il connote non seulement un état d'esprit ou une attitude dans l'exercice concret des fonctions judiciaires, mais aussi un statut, une relation avec autrui, particulièrement avec l'organe exécutif du gouvernement, qui repose sur des conditions ou garanties objectives.

Fawcett, in The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (1969), p. 156, commenting on the requirement of an "independent and impartial tribunal established by law" in article 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, puts the distinction between independence and impartiality as follows:

> The often fine distinction between independence and impartiality turns mainly, it seems, on that between the status of the tribunal determinable largely by objective tests and the subjective attitudes of its members, lay or legal. Independence is primarily freedom from control by, or subordination to, the executive power in the State; impartiality is rather absence in the members of the tribunal of personal interest in the issues to be determined by it, or some form of prejudice.

The scope of the necessary status or relationship of independence has been variously defined. For example, Shetreet, in Judges on Trial: A Study of the Appointment and Accountability of the English Judiciary (1976), emphasizes in the following passage at pp. 17-18 the importance of freedom from the influence of certain powerful non-governmental interests:

> Independence of the judiciary has normally been thought of as freedom from interference by the Executive or Legislature in the exercise of the judicial function. This, for example, was the conception expressed by the International Congress of Jurists at New Delhi in 1959 (The Rule of Law in a Free Society, 11 (Report of the International Congress of Jurists, New Delhi, 1959, prepared by N. S. Marsh)) and arises from the fact that historically the independence of the judiciary was endangered by parliaments and monarchs. In modern times, with the steady growth of the corporate giants, it is of utmost importance that the independence of the judiciary from business or corporate interests should also be secured (Accord G. Borrie, Judicial Conflicts of Interest in Britain, 18 Am. J. Comp. L. 697 (1970)). In short, independence of the judiciary implies not only that a judge should be free from governmental and political pressure and political entanglements but also that he should be removed from financial or business entanglements likely to affect, or rather to seem to affect, him in the exercise of his judicial functions.

À la page 156 de son ouvrage intitulé The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (1969), Fawcett parle de l'exigence d'un «tribunal indépendant et impartial, établi par la loi» que l'on trouve à l'article 6 de la Convention européenne de sauvegarde des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales, et fait la distinction suivante entre l'indépendance et l'impartialité:

> [TRADUCTION] La distinction souvent ténue entre l'indépendance et l'impartialité tient principalement, semble-t-il, à celle entre le statut du tribunal, qui peut être déterminé en grande partie en fonction de critères objectifs, et les attitudes subjectives de ses membres, juristes ou non. L'indépendance consiste avant tout à échapper au contrôle du pouvoir exécutif de l'État, ou à une subordination à celui-ci; l'impartialité, c'est plutôt l'absence chez les membres du tribunal d'intérêts personnels dans les questions sur lesquelles il doit statuer ou d'une forme quelconque de préjugé.

L'étendue du statut ou de la relation d'indépendance nécessaires a été définie de diverses manières. Par exemple, dans Judges on Trial: A Study of the Appointment and Accountability of the English Judiciary (1976), Shetreet souligne dans le passage suivant, aux pp. 17 et 18, l'importance d'être à l'abri de l'influence de certains intérêts puissants non gouvernementaux:

> [TRADUCTION] L'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire est normalement conçue comme le fait d'être à l'abri de toute intervention du pouvoir exécutif ou du corps législatif dans l'exercice des fonctions judiciaires. C'était là par exemple la conception du Congrès international de juristes qui s'est tenu à New Delhi, en 1959 (Le principe de la légalité dans une société libre, 11 (Rapport des travaux du Congrès international de juristes tenu à New Delhi, 1959, rédigé par N. S. Marsh)); elle découle du fait qu'historiquement l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire était menacée par les parlements et les monarques. De nos jours, avec la croissance incessante de sociétés géantes, il est de la plus grande importance d'assurer aussi l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire vis-à-vis des intérêts d'entreprises ou de sociétés (Accord G. Borrie, Judicial Conflicts of Interest in Britain, 18 Am. J. Comp. L. 697 (1970)). En bref, l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire implique non seulement qu'un juge doit être à l'abri des pressions gouvernementales et politiques et des démêlés politiques, mais qu'il doit aussi être tenu à l'écart des démêlés financiers ou d'affaires susceptibles d'influer, ou plutôt de sembler influer, sur lui dans l'exercice de ses fonctions judiciaires.

The scope of the status or relationship of judicial independence was defined in a very comprehensive manner by Sir Guy Green, Chief Justice of the State of Tasmania, in "The Rationale and Some Aspects of Judicial Independence," (1985), 59 A.L.J. 135, at p. 135 as follows:

> I thus define judicial independence as the capacity of the courts to perform their constitutional function free from actual or apparent interference by, and to the extend that it is constitutionally possible, free from actual or apparent dependence upon, any persons or institutions, including, in particular, the executive arm of government, over which they do not exercise direct control.

The focus in the appeal, as indicated by the nature of the various objections to the status of provincial court judges, is on the relationship of the judges and the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) to the executive government of Ontario, and in particular to the Ministry of the Attorney General.

It is generally agreed that judicial independence involves both individual and institutional relationships: the individual independence of a judge, as reflected in such matters as security of tenure, and the institutional independence of the court or tribunal over which he or she presides, as reflected in its institutional or administrative relationships to the executive and legislative branches of government. See Lederman, "The Independence of the Judiciary" in The Canadian Judiciary (1976, ed. A. M. Linden), p. 7; and Deschênes, Masters in their own house (1981), passim, where the notion of institutional independence is referred to as "collective" independence. The objections in the present case to the status of provincial court judges under the legislation and regulations that prevailed at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction raise issues of both individual and institutional independence. The relationship between these two aspects of judicial independence is that an individual judge may enjoy the essential conditions of judicial independence but if the court or tribunal over which he or she presides is not independent of the other branches of government, in what is essential to its function, he or she cannot be said to be an independent tribunal.

L'étendue du statut ou de la relation d'indépendance judiciaire a été définie de façon très exhaustive par sir Guy Green, juge en chef de l'État de Tasmanie, dans son article intitulé «The Rationale and Some Aspects of Judicial Independence» (1985), 59 A.L.J. 135, à la p. 135:

> [TRADUCTION] Je définis donc l'indépendance judiciaire comme la capacité des tribunaux d'exercer leurs fonctions constitutionnelles à l'abri de toute intervention réelle ou apparente de la part de toutes personnes ou institutions sur lesquelles ils n'exercent pas un contrôle direct, y compris, notamment, l'organe exécutif du gouvernement, et dans la mesure où cela est constitutionnellement possible en étant exempts de toute dépendance réelle ou apparente vis-à-vis de celles-ci.

On s'est concentré dans ce pourvoi, comme l'indique la nature des diverses objections portant sur le statut des juges de cour provinciale, sur le rapport qu'il y a entre, d'une part, les juges et la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) et, d'autre part, le pouvoir exécutif ontarien, et en particulier le ministère du Procureur général.

On admet généralement que l'indépendance judiciaire fait intervenir des rapports tant individuels qu'institutionnels: l'indépendance individuelle d'un juge, qui se manifeste dans certains de ses attributs, telle l'inamovibilité, et l'indépendance institutionnelle de la cour ou du tribunal qu'il préside, qui ressort de ses rapports institutionnels ou administratifs avec les organes exécutif et législatif du gouvernement. Voir Lederman, «The Independence of the Judiciary» dans The Canadian Judiciary (1976, ed. A. M. Linden), p. 7, et Deschênes, Maîtres chez eux (1981), passim, où la notion d'indépendance institutionnelle est appelée indépendance «collective». Les objections en l'espèce concernant le statut que possédaient les juges de cour provinciale, en vertu de la législation et de la réglementation qui prévalaient à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, soulèvent des questions d'indépendance tant individuelle qu'institutionnelle. Le rapport entre ces deux aspects de l'indépendance judiciaire est qu'un juge, pris individuellement, peut jouir des conditions essentielles à l'indépendance judiciaire, mais si la cour ou le tribunal qu'il préside n'est pas indépendant des autres organes du gouvernement dans ce qui est essentiel à sa fonction, on ne peut pas dire qu'il constitue un tribunal indépendant.

In his reasons for judgment Howland C.J.O. referred in various ways to the independence required by s. 11(d) of the Charter. In some expressions of the issue he suggested that the question was whether the objections to the status of a provincial court judge gave rise to a reasonable apprehension that the tribunal would not act in an independent manner in the particular adjudication. This is suggested by the words "it could not be reasonably apprehended that the tribunal would not be independent and impartial in its adjudication". This view of the issue would give the word "independent" essentially the same kind of meaning and effect as the word "impartial", as referring to the state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in the actual exercise of its judicial function. In other expressions of the issue, however, Howland C.J.O. referred to the question as being whether the various objections to the status of a provincial court judge gave rise to a reasonable apprehension that the tribunal lacked the capacity to adjudicate in an independent manner. This is suggested by the words "a tribunal which could make an independent and impartial adjudication" in the statement of the test for independence which has been quoted above and by the words "a reasonable apprehension that they would impair the ability of Judge Sharpe to make an independent and impartial adjudication". This I take to be more clearly a reference to the objective status or relationship of judicial independence, which in my opinion is the primary meaning to be given to the word "independent" in s. 11(d). Of course, the concern is ultimately with how a tribunal will actually act in a particular adjudication, and a tribunal that does not act in an independent manner cannot be held to be independent within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter, regardless of its objective status. But a tribunal which lacks the objective status or relationship of independence cannot be held to be independent within the meaning of s. 11(d), regardless of how it may appear to have acted in the particular adjudication. It is the objective status or relationship of judicial independence that is to provide the assurance that the tribunal has the capacity to act in an independent manner and will in fact act in such a manner. It is, therefore, necessary to consider what should be regarded, with reference to the various objections to the status of provincial court judges, as the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d). Before doing that, however, it is necessary to consider the requirement in the test applied by the Court of Appeal that the status or relationship of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) be one which a reasonable, well informed person would perceive as sufficient.

Dans ses motifs de jugement, le juge en chef Howland s'est référé de diverses manières à l'indépendance requise par l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Dans certaines formulations de la question en litige, il laisse entendre qu'il s'agit de déterminer si les objections au statut d'un juge de cour provinciale laissent raisonnablement craindre que le tribunal n'agira pas d'une manière indépendante dans une espèce particulière. C'est ce que donne à entendre la phrase [TRADUCTION] «on ne pouvait raisonnablement craindre que le tribunal ne serait pas indépendant et impartial pour rendre jugement». Cette conception de la question litigieuse a pour effet de donner au terme «indépendant» essentiellement les mêmes sens et effet que ceux du terme «impartial», comme désignant l'état d'esprit ou l'attitude du tribunal lorsqu'il exerce concrètement ses fonctions judiciaires. Dans d'autres formulations de la question litigieuse cependant, le juge en chef Howland parle de la question comme étant de savoir si les diverses objections au statut de juge de cour provinciale faisaient naître une crainte raisonnable que le tribunal n'ait pas la capacité de statuer d'une manière indépendante. C'est ce que laisse entendre l'expression «un tribunal en mesure de statuer en toute indépendance et impartialité» dans son exposé du critère d'indépendance que j'ai déjà cité, ainsi que la phrase «ne permettent pas raisonnablement de craindre qu'il y ait atteinte à la capacité du juge Sharpe de statuer en toute indépendance et impartialité». Je pense que c'est là plus précisément une référence au statut objectif ou à la relation d'indépendance judiciaire, qui, à mon avis, est le premier sens qu'il faut donner au terme «indépendant» de l'al. 11*d*). Naturellement, on se préoccupe finalement de la manière dont un tribunal agira concrètement dans une espèce particulière, et un tribunal qui n'agit pas en toute indépendance ne saurait être considéré comme indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, quel que soit son statut objectif. Mais un tribunal dépourvu du statut objectif ou de la relation d'indépendance ne peut être considéré comme indépendant aux termes de l'al. 11*d*), quelle que soit la manière dont il paraît avoir agi dans une espèce particulière. C'est le statut objectif ou la relation d'indépendance judiciaire qui doit fournir l'assurance que le tribunal peut agir d'une manière

Although judicial independence is a status or relationship resting on objective conditions or guarantees, as well as a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions, it is sound, I think, that the test for independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter should be, as for impartiality, whether the tribunal may be reasonably perceived as independent. Both independence and impartiality are fundamental not only to the capacity to do justice in a particular case but also to individual and public confidence in the administration of justice. Without that confidence the system cannot command the respect and acceptance that are essential to its effective operation. It is, therefore, important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception. The perception must, however, as I have suggested, be a perception of whether the tribunal enjoys the essential objective conditions or guarantees of judicial independence, and not a perception of how it will in fact act, regardless of whether it enjoys such conditions or guarantees.

This view of the test for independence is somewhat different from, but not in my opinion necessarily in conflict with, that suggested by the majority of this Court in MacKay v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 370, which was relied on to some extent by Howland C.J.O. in his reasons for judgment. In that case the relevant issue, for purposes of this appeal, was whether a Standing Court Martial trying a member of the armed forces for an offence under the criminal law and composed of indépendante et qu'il agira effectivement de cette manière. Il est donc nécessaire de rechercher ce qui doit être considéré, en rapport avec les diverses objections au statut des juges de cour provinciale, comme les conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire aux fins de l'al. 11*d*). Avant de ce faire cependant, il est nécessaire d'examiner l'exigence du critère appliqué par la Cour d'appel, portant que le statut ou le rapport d'indépendance judiciaire aux fins de l'al. 11*d*) doit en être un qu'une personne raisonnable et bien informée percevrait comme suffisant.

Même si l'indépendance judiciaire est un statut ou une relation reposant sur des conditions ou des garanties objectives, autant qu'un état d'esprit ou une attitude dans l'exercice concret des fonctions judiciaires, il est logique, à mon avis, que le critère de l'indépendance aux fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte soit, comme dans le cas de l'impartialité, de savoir si le tribunal peut raisonnablement être perçu comme indépendant. Tant l'indépendance que l'impartialité sont fondamentales non seulement pour pouvoir rendre justice dans un cas donné, mais aussi pour assurer la confiance de l'individu comme du public dans l'administration de la justice. Sans cette confiance, le système ne peut commander le respect et l'acceptation qui sont essentiels à son fonctionnement efficace. Il importe donc qu'un tribunal soit perçu comme indépendant autant qu'impartial et que le critère de l'indépendance comporte cette perception qui doit toutefois, comme je l'ai proposé, être celle d'un tribunal jouissant des conditions ou garanties objectives essentielles d'indépendance judiciaire, et non pas une perception de la manière dont il agira en fait, indépendamment de la question de savoir s'il jouit de ces conditions ou garanties.

Cette conception du critère de l'indépendance diffère quelque peu, quoique à mon avis elle ne soit pas nécessairement incompatible avec elle, de celle proposée par cette Cour à la majorité, dans l'arrêt MacKay c. La Reine, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 370, sur laquelle s'est appuyé, dans une certaine mesure, le juge en chef Howland dans ses motifs de jugement. Dans cette affaire, la question qui nous intéresse aux fins du présent pourvoi était de savoir si une cour martiale permanente, jugeant un membre des an officer of the armed forces in the Judge Advocate General's branch was an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 2(f) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which provides:

The majority held that the fact the president of the Standing Court Martial was an officer of the armed forces did not prevent the tribunal from being an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 2(f). In the reasons for judgment of Ritchie J., with whom Martland, Pigeon, Beetz and Chouinard JJ. concurred, there is a suggestion that the issue of independence was viewed as being whether the tribunal had in fact acted in an idependent manner. Ritchie J. referred to the evidence and said at p. 395:

> There is no evidence whatever in the record of the trial to suggest that the president acted in anything but an independent and impartial manner or that he was otherwise unfitted for the task to which he was appointed.

> I can find no support in the evidence for the contention that the appointment of the president of the Court resulted or was calculated to result in the appellant being deprived of a trial before an independent and impartial tribunal.

While the emphasis in these observations would appear to be on how the tribunal acted, it is my impression that both Ritchie J. and McIntyre J., who wrote separate reasons concurring in the result, and with whom Dickson J. (as he then was) concurred, both looked at the status or relationship forces armées pour une infraction de droit criminel et composée d'un officier des forces armées relevant de la Direction du juge-avocat général, constituait un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 2*f*) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits, qui porte:

> 2. Toute loi du Canada, à moins qu'une loi du Parlement du Canada ne déclare expressément qu'elle s'appliquera nonobstant la Déclaration canadienne des droits, doit s'interpréter et s'appliquer de manière à ne pas supprimer, restreindre ou enfreindre l'un quelconque des droits ou des libertés reconnus et déclarés aux présentes, ni à en autoriser la suppression, la diminution ou la transgression, et en particulier, nulle loi du Canada ne doit s'interpréter ni s'appliquer comme

La Cour à la majorité a jugé que même si le président de la Cour martiale permanente était un officier des forces armées, cela n'empêchait pas ce tribunal d'être un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 2*f*). Dans les motifs de jugement du juge Ritchie, auxquels ont souscrit les juges Martland, Pigeon, Beetz et Chouinard, on laisse entendre que la question de l'indépendance a été considérée comme s'il s'était agi de savoir si le tribunal avait en fait agi d'une manière indépendante. Le juge Ritchie se référant à la preuve affirme, à la p. 395:

> Absolument rien au dossier du procès ne laisse entendre que le président ait agi autrement que d'une façon indépendante et non préjugée ou qu'il ait par ailleurs été inapte à s'acquitter de la tâche qu'on lui avait confiée.

> Je ne trouve rien dans la preuve qui fonde la prétention que la nomination du président de la cour pour le procès a eu pour résultat de priver l'appelant d'un procès devant un tribunal indépendant et non préjugé ou qu'elle visait ce résultat.

Si l'on paraît insister dans ces observations sur la manière dont le tribunal a agi, j'ai l'impression que le juge Ritchie et le juge McIntyre, qui a écrit des motifs distincts concordants quant au résultat, auxquels le juge Dickson (maintenant juge en chef) a souscrit, ont tous deux examiné le statut ou to the armed forces of the president of the Standing Court Martial Appeal as an objective matter to be considered in determining whether the tribunal could be regarded as independent. Both emphasized the long-established tradition of a separate system of military law applied by tribunals presided over by military officers. Both also emphasized the status of the Court Martial Appeal Court and its independence of the armed forces as ensuring that the person charged would be presumed innocent until proved guilty by an independent tribunal. I am, therefore, of the respectful opinion that the reasoning of this Court in MacKay does not preclude the view that the word "independent" in s. 11(d) of the Charter is to be understood as referring to the status or relationship of judicial independence as well as to the state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in the actual exercise of its judicial function.

III

What should be considered as the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter—that is, those which may be reasonably perceived as such—is a difficult question. The concept of judicial independence has been an evolving one. See Shetreet, op. cit., pp. 383-84. The history of judicial independence in Great Britain and Canada is analyzed by Professor Lederman in his classic and frequently cited essay on the subject, "The Independence of the Judiciary" (1956), 34 Can. Bar Rev. 769, 769-809 and 1139-1179. The reasons of Howland C.J.O. in the case at bar contain a succinct and helpful review of the main features of the development of judicial independence in England and Canada, with particular reference to the status of provincial magistrates and courts. Modern views on the subject of judicial independence are reflected in the Deschênes report to which reference has been made, and in the recent report of the Canadian Bar Association's Committee on The Independence of the Judiciary in Canada. There have also been a number of international declarations of principle on judicial independence, of which the Universal Declaration on the Independence of Justice produced by the First World Conference on the Independence of Justice held in Montreal in June, la relation entre les forces armées et le président de la Cour martiale permanente, à titre de question objective dont il fallait tenir compte pour décider si le tribunal pouvait être considéré comme indépendant. Tous deux ont insisté sur la tradition fort ancienne d'un système distinct de justice militaire administré par des tribunaux présidés par des militaires. Tous deux ont aussi souligné que le statut du Tribunal d'appel des cours martiales et son indépendance des forces armées assuraient que l'inculpé serait présumé innocent, jusqu'à preuve du contraire, par un tribunal indépendant. Avec égards, je suis donc d'avis que le raisonnement de cette Cour dans l'arrêt MacKay n'exclut pas l'opinion que le terme «indépendant» de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte doit être interprété comme visant le statut ou la relation d'indépendance judiciaire, autant que l'état d'esprit ou l'attitude du tribunal dans l'exercice concret de ses fonctions judiciaires.

Que doit-on considérer comme conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire aux fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, c.-à-d. celles qu'on peut raisonnablement percevoir comme telles? C'est là une question difficile. La notion d'indépendance judiciaire a évolué. Voir Shetreet, précité, aux pp. 383 et 384. L'histoire de l'indépendance judiciaire en Grande-Bretagne et au Canada est analysée par le professeur Lederman dans un essai classique fréquemment cité sur le sujet: «The Independence of the Judiciary» (1956), 34 R. du B. can. 769, 769 à 809 et 1139 à 1179. Les motifs du juge en chef Howland en l'espèce comportent une étude succincte et utile des principales caractéristiques de l'évolution de l'indépendance judiciaire en Angleterre et au Canada, où l'on mentionne de façon particulière le statut des magistrats et tribunaux provinciaux. Les points de vue contemporains sur l'indépendance judiciaire se reflètent dans le rapport Deschênes, déjà mentionné, et dans le rapport récent du Comité de l'Association du Barreau canadien sur L'Indépendance de la magistrature au Canada. Il y a aussi eu un bon nombre de déclarations internationales de principe sur l'indépendance judiciaire, dont la plus importante est peut-être la Déclaration universelle sur l'indépendance de la Justice de la Première conférence 1983 is perhaps the most important. The recently published collection of papers and addresses, Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate (1985), edited by Shetreet and Deschênes, reflects the most up-to-date thinking on the subject. The concluding paper by Shetreet, entitled "Judicial Independence: New Conceptual Dimensions and Contemporary Challenges", provides a valuable overview of the conceptual development in this area.

Conceptions have changed over the years as to what ideally may be required in the way of substance and procedure for securing judicial independence in as ample a measure as possible. Opinions differ on what is necessary or desirable, or feasible. This is particularly true, for example, of the degree of administrative independence or autonomy it is thought the courts should have. It is also true of the extent to which certain extra-judicial activity of judges may be perceived as impairing the reality or perception of judicial independence. There is renewed concern about the procedure and criteria for the appointment of judges as that may bear on the perception of judicial independence. Professional and lay concern about judicial independence has increased with the new power and responsibility given to the courts by the Charter. Reports and speeches on the subject of judicial independence in recent years have urged the general adoption of the highest standards or safeguards, not only with respect to the traditional elements of judicial independence, but also with respect to other aspects now seen as having an important bearing on the reality and perception of judicial independence. These efforts, particularly by the legal profession and the judiciary, to strengthen the conditions of judicial independence in Canada may be expected to continue as a movement towards the ideal. It would not be feasible, however, to apply the most rigorous and elaborate conditions of judicial independence to the constitutional requirement of independence in s. 11(d) of the Charter, which may have to be applied to a variety of tribunals. The legislative and constitutional provisions in Canada governing matters which bear on the judicial independence of tribunals trying persons charged with an offence exhibit a great range and variety. The essential conditions of judicial independence mondiale sur l'indépendance de la justice tenue à Montréal en 1983. Le recueil d'articles et d'allocutions récemment publié, Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate (1985), sous la direction de Shetreet et Deschênes, traduit la pensée la plus récente sur ce sujet. Servant de conclusion, l'article de Shetreet, intitulé «Judicial Independence: New Conceptual Dimensions and Contemporary Challenges», présente une vue d'ensemble précieuse de l'évolution des idées dans ce domaine.

Les idées ont évolué au cours des années sur ce qui idéalement peut être requis, sur le plan du fond comme sur celui de la procédure, pour assurer une indépendance judiciaire aussi grande que possible. Les opinions diffèrent sur ce qui est nécessaire ou souhaitable, ou encore réalisable. Cela est particulièrement vrai, par exemple, en ce qui concerne le degré d'indépendance ou d'autonomie que les tribunaux, pense-t-on devraient avoir sur le plan administratif. Cela est vrai aussi de la mesure dans laquelle certaines activités extrajudiciaires des juges peuvent être perçues comme portant atteinte à la réalité ou à la perception de l'indépendance judiciaire. Il y a un regain d'intérêt pour la procédure et les critères de nomination des juges, car ils peuvent avoir un effet sur la perception de l'indépendance judiciaire. Les préoccupations des juristes et des profanes concernant l'indépendance judiciaire se sont accrues avec les nouvelles attributions et responsabilités que la Charte a conférées aux tribunaux. Dans des rapports et des discours sur l'indépendance judiciaire, on a réclamé, ces dernières années, l'adoption généralisée des plus hautes normes ou garanties, non seulement à l'égard des éléments traditionnels de l'indépendance judiciaire, mais aussi à l'égard des autres aspects considérés aujourd'hui comme ayant un effet important sur la réalité et la perception de l'indépendance judiciaire. On peut s'attendre que ces efforts, déployés particulièrement par les milieux juridique et judiciaire en vue d'affermir les conditions de l'indépendance judiciaire au Canada, vont continuer à viser l'idéal. Il ne serait cependant pas possible d'appliquer les conditions les plus rigoureuses et les plus élaborées de l'indépendance judiciaire à l'exigence constitutionnelle d'indépendance qu'énonce l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, qui peut devoir s'appliquer à différents tribunaux. Les dis-dependence for purposes of s. 11(d) must bear some reasonable relationship to that variety. Moreover, it is the essence of the security afforded by the essential conditions of judicial independence that is appropriate for application under s. 11(d) and not any particular legislative or constitutional formula by which it may be provided or guaranteed.

Counsel for the Provincial Court Judges Association submitted that there should be a uniform standard of judicial independence under s. 11(d) and that it should be essentially the one embodied by ss. 99 and 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provide:

99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the Judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and House of Commons.

(2) A Judge of a Superior Court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age.

100. The Salaries, Allowances, and Pensions of the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts (except the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick), and of the Admiralty Courts in Cases where the Judges thereof are for the Time being paid by Salary, shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

These provisions are generally regarded as representing the highest degree of constitutional guarantee of security of tenure and security of salary and pension. They find their historical inspiration in the provisions of the Act of Settlement of 1701 [12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2], which provided that judges should hold office during good behaviour, subject to removal on an address of both Houses of Parliament, and that their salaries should be "ascertained and established". Provincial court judges contend that they should have the same constitutional guarantees of security of tenure and security positions législatives et constitutionnelles qui, au Canada, régissent les questions ayant une portée sur l'indépendance judiciaire des tribunaux qui jugent les personnes accusées d'une infraction sont fort diverses et variées. Les conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire, pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*), doivent avoir un lien raisonnable avec cette diversité. De plus, c'est l'essence de la garantie fournie par les conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire qu'il convient d'appliquer en vertu de l'al. 11*d*), et non pas quelque formule législative ou constitutionnelle particulière qui peut l'offrir ou l'assurer.

Les avocats de l'Association des juges des cours provinciales ont fait valoir qu'il devrait y avoir une norme uniforme d'indépendance judiciaire en vertu de l'al. 11*d*) et que ce devrait essentiellement être celle que l'on trouve aux art. 99 et 100 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, qui portent:

99. (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2) du présent article, les juges des cours supérieures resteront en fonctions à titre inamovible, mais ils pourront être révoqués par le gouverneur général sur une adresse du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes.

(2) Un juge d'une cour supérieure, nommé avant ou après l'entrée en vigueur du présent article, cessera de détenir sa charge lorsqu'il aura atteint l'âge de soixante-quinze ans, ou à la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent article si, à cette date, il a déjà atteint cet âge.

100. Les traitements, allocations et pensions des juges des cours supérieures, de district et de comté (sauf les cours de vérification en Nouvelle-Écosse et au Nouveau-Brunswick) et des cours de l'Amirauté, lorsque ces juges reçoivent actuellement un traitement, seront fixés et assurés par le Parlement du Canada.

Ces dispositions sont généralement considérées comme représentant le plus haut degré de garantie constitutionnelle d'inamovibilité et de sécurité de traitement et de pension. Elles s'inspirent historiquement des dispositions de l'Acte d'établissement de 1701 [12 & 13 Will. 3, chap. 2], qui prévoyait que les juges occuperaient leur charge durant bonne conduite, sous réserve de révocation par une adresse des deux chambres du Parlement, et que leur salaire serait [TRADUCTION] «fixé et établi». Les juges de cour provinciale soutiennent qu'ils devraient jouir des mêmes garanties constitution-of salary and pension as superior court judges. Whatever may be the merits of this contention from the point of view of legislative or constitutional policy, I do not think that it can be given effect to in the construction and application of s. 11(d). To do so would be, in effect, to amend the judicature provisions of the Constitution. The standard of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) cannot be a standard of uniform provisions. It must necessarily be a standard that reflects what is common to, or at the heart of, the various approaches to the essential conditions of judicial independence in Canada.

IV

It is necessary then to consider the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter, as they relate to the various objections to the status of provincial court judges raised before Sharpe J. Certain of these objections touch on the question of security of tenure. Security of tenure, because of the importance that has traditionally been attached to it, must be regarded as the first of the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter.

The provisions in Ontario governing the security of tenure of provincial court judges up to the age of retirement at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction were contained in s. 4 of the Provincial Courts Act. Section 4 provided that a provincial court judge could be removed from office only "for misbehaviour or for inability to perform his duties properly" and only after an inquiry by a superior court judge at which the Provincial Court judge affected had been given a full opportunity to be heard. The report of the inquiry had to be laid before the Legislative Assembly, but the Lieutenant Governor in Council was not bound to act in accordance with its findings or recommendations. Under the provision for removal before retirement which now applies to provincial court judges—s. 56(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, 1984 (Ont.), c. 11, which came into force on January 1, 1985—a judge may be removed from office before nelles d'inamovibilité et de sécurité de traitement et de pension que les juges des cours supérieures. Quel que soit le bien-fondé de cet argument du point de vue de la politique législative ou constitutionnelle, je ne pense pas qu'il puisse s'appliquer quand il s'agit d'interpréter et d'appliquer l'al. 11*d*). Ce faire reviendrait en fait à modifier les dispositions de la Constitution relatives à la magistrature. La norme de l'indépendance judiciaire, pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*), ne peut être l'uniformité des dispositions. Ce doit nécessairement être une norme qui reflète ce qui est commun aux diverses conceptions des conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire au Canada ou ce qui est au centre de ces conceptions.

Il est donc nécessaire d'examiner les conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, étant donné le rapport qu'elles ont avec les diverses objections au statut des juges de cour provinciale soulevées devant le juge Sharpe. Certaines de ces objections touchent à la question de l'inamovibilité. L'inamovibilité, de par l'importance qui y a été attachée traditionnellement, doit être considérée comme la première des conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte.

Les dispositions ontariennes régissant l'inamovibilité des juges de cour provinciale jusqu'à l'âge de la retraite, à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, se trouvaient à l'art. 4 de la Loi sur les cours provinciales. L'article 4 portait qu'un juge de cour provinciale ne pouvait être démis de ses fonctions que [TRADUCTION] «pour mauvaise conduite ou pour incapacité d'exercer convenablement ses fonctions», et ce, uniquement après la tenue d'une enquête par un juge de cour supérieure, au cours de laquelle le juge de cour provinciale en cause avait eu pleinement l'occasion de se faire entendre. Le rapport de l'enquête devait être déposé à l'Assemblée législative, mais le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil n'était pas obligé de se conformer à ses conclusions ou recommandations. En vertu de la disposition de révocation avant retraite qui s'applique aujourd'hui aux juges de cour provinciale—le par. 56(1) de la Loi de 1984 the age of retirement only if a complaint has been made to the Judicial Council for Provincial Judges and if the removal is recommended by a judicial inquiry on the ground that the judge has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office by reason of infirmity, by conduct that is incompatible with the execution of the office, or by having failed to perform the duties of the office. The judge may be removed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council only on an address of the Legislative Assembly.

There are, of course, a variety of ways in which the essentials of security of tenure may be provided by constitutional or legislative provision. As I have indicated, superior court judges in Canada enjoy what is generally regarded as the highest degree of security of tenure in the constitutional guarantee of s. 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867 that they shall hold office during good behaviour until the age of seventy-five, subject to removal by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. The judges of this Court, the Federal Court of Canada and the Tax Court of Canada also enjoy, under their respective governing statutes, a tenure during good behaviour until a specified age of retirement, subject to removal only on address of the Senate and House of Commons. The judges of the county courts hold office during good behaviour but are removable by the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, following an inquiry or investigation and report by the Canadian Judicial Council, pursuant to ss. 40 and 41 of the Judges Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. J-1. Under these sections, which provide for an inquiry or investigation by the Council into the conduct or capacity of a judge of a superior, district or county court or of the Tax Court of Canada, the Council is empowered to recommend the removal of a judge. The grounds on which it may do so, as set out in s. 41, are that the judge has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of office by age or infirmity, by having been guilty of misconduct, by having failed in the due execution of office, or by having been placed by misconduct or otherwise in a position incompatible with the due execution of office.

sur les tribunaux judiciaires, 1984 (Ont.), chap. 11, entré en vigueur le 1er janvier 1985—un juge ne peut se voir démis de ses fonctions avant l'âge de la retraite que par suite d'une plainte portée au Conseil de la magistrature des juges provinciaux et que si la révocation est recommandée, après enquête judiciaire, pour le motif que le juge est devenu incapable de remplir dûment ses fonctions pour cause d'infirmité ou de conduite incompatible avec sa charge, ou parce qu'il n'a pas rempli les devoirs de sa charge. Le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil ne peut démettre le juge de ses fonctions que sur adresse de l'Assemblée législative.

Il existe bien entendu diverses façons de prévoir les conditions essentielles de l'inamovibilité par une disposition constitutionnelle ou législative. Comme je l'ai indiqué, les juges de cour supérieure au Canada jouissent de ce qui est généralement considéré comme le plus haut degré d'inamovibilité qu'offre la garantie constitutionnelle de l'art. 99 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867: ils occupent leur charge à titre inamovible jusqu'à l'âge de soixante-quinze ans à moins d'être révoqués par le gouverneur général sur adresse du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes. En vertu des lois qui les régissent respectivement, les juges de cette Cour, ceux de la Cour fédérale du Canada et ceux de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt occupent également leur charge à titre inamovible jusqu'à un âge précis de mise à la retraite, à moins seulement d'être révoqués sur adresse du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes. Les juges des cours de comté occupent leur charge à titre inamovible, mais peuvent être démis de leurs fonctions par le gouverneur en conseil, sur la recommandation du ministre de la Justice, après enquête et rapport du Conseil canadien de la magistrature, conformément aux art. 40 et 41 de la Loi sur les juges, S.R.C. 1970, chap. J-1. En vertu de ces articles qui prévoient la tenue d'une enquête sur la conduite ou la capacité d'un juge d'une cour supérieure, d'une cour de district, d'une cour de comté ou de la Cour canadienne de l'impôt, le Conseil peut recommander la révocation d'un juge. Les motifs pour lesquels il peut le faire, énoncés à l'art. 41, sont que le juge est frappé d'une incapacité ou d'une invalidité qui l'empêche de remplir utilement ses fonctions et est due à l'âge ou à une infirmité, au fait qu'il s'est office. The judge must be given an opportunity to be heard, in person or by counsel, and to cross-examine witnesses and adduce evidence. Where a judge may be removed by the Governor in Council following a report of the Council, as in the case of a county court judge, the Governor in Council is not bound by the report. The security of tenure provided for provincial court judges in Canada is, generally speaking, that they may be removed by the executive government before the age of retirement only for misbehaviour or disability following a judicial inquiry. There is considerable variation in the relevant provisions of the provincial legislation. In some cases it is expressly provided that they shall hold office during good behaviour; in others, the specific grounds for removal are spelled out and may, as I have indicated, be generally summarized as misbehaviour or misconduct rendering the judge unfit for office or incapacity by reason of infirmity. The essence of these provisions is that a provincial judge may be removed before the age of retirement only for cause. There is also provision for a judicial inquiry into whether there is cause at which the judge affected is afforded a full opportunity to be heard. In some cases the executive government is bound by the report of the inquiry; in most cases the government is not bound by it.

The Deschênes report recommended that all judges should enjoy a tenure expressly defined as being "during good behaviour" and that they should be removable only upon an address of the legislature. Alternatively, the report recommended that if the power of removal by the executive without an address of the legislature were retained, the executive should be bound by the report of the judicial inquiry. The report of the Canadian Bar Association Committee on judicial independence recommended that "All judges of Canadian Courts be guaranteed tenure during good behaviour". There is also an implication at p. 16 of the report that the committee was of the view that a rendu coupable de mauvaise conduite, au fait qu'il n'a pas rempli utilement ses fonctions ou à celui que, par sa conduite ou pour toute autre raison, il s'est mis dans une situation telle qu'il ne peut remplir utilement ses fonctions. Le juge doit avoir la possibilité de se faire entendre, personnellement ou par avocat, et de contre-interroger des témoins et de produire une preuve. Lorsqu'un juge ne peut être révoqué que par le gouverneur en conseil après rapport du Conseil canadien de la magistrature, le gouverneur en conseil n'est pas lié par le rapport. L'inamovibilité prévue pour les juges de cour provinciale au Canada consiste, en général, dans le fait qu'ils ne peuvent être révoqués par le pouvoir exécutif avant l'âge de la retraite que pour mauvaise conduite ou invalidité, après enquête judiciaire. Les dispositions pertinentes des lois provinciales présentent une grande diversité. Dans certains cas, il est expressément prévu qu'ils occupent leur charge à titre inamovible. Dans d'autres cas, les motifs spécifiques de révocation sont énoncés bien clairement et, comme je l'ai déjà indiqué, se ramènent à la mauvaise conduite ou à un mauvais comportement qui rend le juge indigne de sa charge, ou à l'incapacité pour cause d'infirmité. Essentiellement, ces dispositions prévoient qu'un juge de cour provinciale ne peut être révoqué avant l'âge de la retraite que pour un motif déterminé. Une enquête judiciaire est aussi prévue pour établir si ce motif existe, le juge visé devant avoir pleinement l'occasion de s'y faire entendre. Dans certains cas, le pouvoir exécutif est lié par le rapport d'enquête; dans la plupart des cas, le gouvernement ne l'est pas.

Le rapport Deschênes recommande que tous les juges occupent leur charge à titre expressément défini comme «inamovible» et qu'ils ne puissent être révoqués que sur adresse du corps législatif. Subsidiairement, le rapport recommande que si le pouvoir de l'exécutif de révoquer sans adresse du corps législatif devait être maintenu, l'exécutif devrait être lié par le rapport d'enquête judiciaire. Le rapport d'un comité de l'Association du Barreau canadien sur l'indépendance de la magistrature recommande que «tous les juges des cours canadiennes soient nommés à titre inamovible». Il découle aussi du rapport, à la p. 17, que le comité était d'avis qu'un juge ne devrait être révoqué que judge should be removable only on an address of the legislature. After referring to s. 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867 respecting the tenure of superior court judges, the committee said: "Since the independence of the judiciary depends to a significant extent on the judges' security of tenure it is appropriate that their removal be a major undertaking, bringing the politicians who must accomplish it under close scrutiny. The removal of a judge is not to be undertaken lightly." It may be desirable that the tenure of judges should be expressed as being during good behaviour, which leaves cause for removal to be determined according to the common law meaning of those words (see Shetreet, op. cit., pp. 89*ff* for the meaning of "during good behaviour" at common law) rather than have the grounds for removal specified in legislation, but I do not think it is reasonable to require that as an essential condition of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. It is sufficient if a judge may be removed only for cause related to the capacity to perform judicial functions. It may be, as suggested by the Deschênes report, that the specified grounds for removal to be found in some of the provincial legislation are too broad, but this would not appear to be true of the grounds for removal specified in s. 4 of the Provincial Courts Act and s. 56(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984. Similarly, it may be desirable, as now provided for in s. 56(1), that a judge should be removable from office only on an address of the legislature, but again I do not think it is reasonable to require this as essential for security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. It may be that the requirement of an address of the legislature makes removal of a judge more difficult in practice because of the solemn, cumbersome and publicly visible nature of the process, but the requirement of cause, as defined by statute, together with a provision for judicial inquiry at which the judge affected is given a full opportunity to be heard, is in my opinion a sufficient restraint upon the power of removal for purposes of s. 11(d). Whether or not the Executive should be bound by the report of the judicial inquiry—that is, whether the power to remove should be conditional upon a finding of cause by the judicial inquiry, as is now provided by sur adresse du corps législatif. Après avoir mentionné l'art. 99 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, concernant l'inamovibilité des juges de cour supérieure, le comité affirme: «Puisque l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire dépend dans une très large mesure de l'inamovibilité des juges, il est normal que leur destitution soit une décision majeure impliquant les politiciens, qui doivent accomplir leur travail sous l'œil vigilant du public. La destitution d'un juge ne peut pas être prise à la légère.» Il est peut-être souhaitable que la charge des juges soit déclarée inamovible, les motifs de révocation devant alors être déterminés en fonction du sens qu'ont ces termes en common law (voir Shetreet, précité, aux pp. 89 et suiv. pour la signification du terme «inamovibilité» en common law) plutôt que de les voir spécifiés dans les lois; cependant, je ne pense pas qu'il soit raisonnable d'exiger cela comme condition essentielle d'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Il suffit qu'un juge ne puisse être révoqué que pour un motif lié à sa capacité d'exercer les fonctions judiciaires. Il se peut, comme le laisse entendre le rapport Deschênes, que les motifs exprès de révocation que l'on trouve dans certaines lois provinciales soient trop larges, mais il ne semble pas que ce soit le cas des motifs de révocation prévus par l'art. 4 de la Loi sur les cours provinciales et par le par. 56(1) de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires. De même, il est peut-être souhaitable, comme le prévoit maintenant le par. 56(1), qu'un juge ne puisse être révoqué que sur adresse du corps législatif mais, ici encore, je ne pense pas qu'il soit raisonnable d'exiger cela comme étant essentiel à l'inamovibilité pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Il se peut que la nécessité d'une adresse du corps législatif rende la révocation d'un juge plus difficile en pratique à cause de la solennité, de la lourdeur et de la visibilité de la procédure, mais qu'un motif soit nécessaire, comme le définit la loi, et qu'une enquête judiciaire soit prévue au cours de laquelle le juge visé a pleinement l'occasion de se faire entendre, constituent à mon avis, une restriction suffisante du pouvoir de révocation pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*). J'estime qu'il est plus difficile de déterminer si l'exécutif doit ou non être lié par le rapport de l'enquête judiciaire, c.-à-d. si le pouvoir de révocation doit être assujetti

s. 56(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984—I find more difficult. Certainly, it is preferable, but I do not think it can be required as essential to security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d). The existence of the report of the judicial inquiry is a sufficient restraint upon the power of removal, particularly where, as provided by s. 4 of the Provincial Courts Act, the report is required to be laid before the legislature.

In sum, I am of the opinion that while the provision concerning security of tenure up to the age of retirement which applied to provincial court judges when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction falls short of the ideal or highest degree of security, it reflects what may be reasonably perceived as the essentials of security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter: that the judge be removable only for cause, and that cause be subject to independent review and determination by a process at which the judge affected is afforded a full opportunity to be heard. The essence of security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d) is a tenure, whether until an age of retirement, for a fixed term, or for a specific adjudicative task, that is secure against interference by the Executive or other appointing authority in a discretionary or arbitrary manner.

The most serious issue with respect to the security of tenure of provincial court judges under the statutory provisions that applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction is the provision in s. 5(4) of the Provincial Courts Act for the reappointment of a judge, upon attaining the age of retirement, to hold office during pleasure. Such reappointment, to be made by the Lieutenant Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, was the subject of two objections: first, that an appointment to hold office during the pleasure of the Executive was incompatible with the requirement of judicial independence; and second, that the need in some cases of such a reappointment to complete entitlement to pension could give rise to a reasonable perception of dependence upon the à la condition que l'enquête judiciaire ait constaté l'existence d'un motif, comme le prévoit maintenant le par. 56(1) de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires. Cela est certainement préférable, mais je ne pense pas que cela puisse être posé comme essentiel à l'inamovibilité pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*). L'existence du rapport d'enquête judiciaire constitue une restriction suffisante du pouvoir de révocation, particulièrement lorsque, comme le prévoit l'art. 4 de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, le rapport doit être déposé devant le corps législatif.

En somme, je suis d'avis que si la disposition concernant l'inamovibilité jusqu'à l'âge de la retraite, qui s'appliquait aux juges de cour provinciale lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, ne fournit une inamovibilité ni idéale ni parfaite, elle fait néanmoins ressortir ce qu'on peut raisonnablement percevoir comme les conditions essentielles de l'inamovibilité pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte: que le juge ne puisse être révoqué que pour un motif déterminé, et que ce motif fasse l'objet d'un examen indépendant et d'une décision selon une procédure qui offre au juge visé toute possibilité de se faire entendre. L'essence de l'inamovibilité pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*), que ce soit jusqu'à l'âge de la retraite, pour une durée fixe, ou pour une charge ad hoc, est que la charge soit à l'abri de toute intervention discrétionnaire ou arbitraire de la part de l'exécutif ou de l'autorité responsable des nominations.

Le point le plus sérieux, en ce qui concerne l'inamovibilité des juges de cour provinciale conférée par les dispositions légales qui s'appliquaient lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, c'est ce que prévoit le par. 5(4) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales au sujet de la nouvelle nomination à titre amovible d'un juge, lorsqu'il atteint l'âge de la retraite. Cette nouvelle nomination, qui doit être faite par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil sur la recommandation du procureur général, a fait l'objet de deux objections: premièrement, une nomination à titre amovible par l'exécutif est incompatible avec l'exigence d'indépendance judiciaire et, deuxièmement, la nécessité dans certains cas de procéder à cette nouvelle nomination afin de rendre admissible à la pension, peut susciter une Executive. Under the pension provisions which applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction, a provincial court judge was entitled to a pension upon attaining the age of sixty-five if he or she had served ten or more years. A judge who had been appointed after the age of fifty-five might be perceived as dependent upon the favour of the Executive for a post-retirement reappointment to complete pension entitlement. The first objection to the provision for post-retirement reappointment in s. 5(4) of the Provincial Courts Act relates to the question of security of tenure, which is the issue presently being considered. The second objection falls into the general category of objections to the status of provincial court judges based upon alleged dependence on the Executive for discretionary benefits or advantages. I propose to address that issue later.

Howland C.J.O. disposed of the objections to the provision for post-retirement reappointment which applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction mainly on the ground that the incumbent Attorney General had, during his seven years in office, always acted with respect to such reappointments on the recommendation of the chief judge of the provincial court in question. That practice or "tradition", as it was referred to, was perhaps more relevant to the second objection to the provision for post-retirement appointment at pleasure—the dependence of provincial court judges on such reappointment to complete pension entitlement—than to the first objection—the lack of security of tenure under such a reappointment—but it may have been assumed that if the Attorney General made a post-retirement reappointment only on the recommendation of a chief judge he could be expected to act only on such recommendation with respect to the termination of such a reappointment. In any event, Howland C.J.O. placed considerable emphasis on the role of tradition as an objective condition or safeguard of judicial independence. Since tradition has most often been invoked in connection with the issue of security of perception raisonnable de dépendance envers l'exécutif. En vertu des dispositions portant sur la pension, qui s'appliquaient lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, un juge de cour provinciale avait droit à une pension quand il atteignait l'âge de soixante-cinq ans, s'il avait occupé sa charge pendant dix ans ou plus. Le juge nommé après l'âge de cinquante-cinq ans pouvait être perçu comme dépendant du bon vouloir de l'exécutif s'il voulait obtenir une nouvelle nomination après avoir atteint l'âge de retraite, en vue de devenir admissible à la pension. La première objection à la nouvelle nomination après avoir atteint l'âge de la retraite, prévue au par. 5(4) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, touche à la question de l'inamovibilité, le point présentement examiné. La seconde objection se situe dans la catégorie générale des objections au statut des juges de cour provinciale, fondées sur une prétendue dépendance envers l'exécutif pour ce qui est d'obtenir des bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires. Je propose de traiter cette question plus loin.

Le juge en chef Howland a repoussé les objections à la disposition relative à la nouvelle nomination après l'âge de la retraite, qui s'appliquait lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, principalement pour le motif que le procureur général en poste avait, durant les sept ans d'exercice de son mandat, toujours agi, en ce qui concerne ces nouvelles nominations, sur la recommandation du juge en chef de la cour provinciale en question. Cette pratique ou «tradition», comme on l'a appelée, est peut-être plus pertinente dans le cas de la seconde objection à la disposition sur les nominations à titre amovible après l'âge de la retraite—le fait que des juges de cour provinciale dépendent de cette nouvelle nomination pour avoir droit à leur pension—que dans le cas de la première objection—l'amovibilité dans le cas d'une nouvelle nomination—mais on peut avoir présumé que si le procureur général ne procédait à une nouvelle nomination après l'âge de la retraite que sur la recommandation d'un juge en chef, on pouvait s'attendre à ce qu'il n'agisse que sur une telle recommandation pour mettre fin à cette nouvelle nomination. De toute façon, le juge en chef Howland a accordé une importance considérable au tenure it is convenient to consider its general role here.

I quote a passage on this subject from the reasons of Howland C.J.O., which refers to the opinions of several learned commentators on the importance of tradition. He said at pp. 431-32:

> Having considered the historical development of judicial independence in England and in Canada, it is necessary to refer to the importance of traditions. Quite apart from the Constitution or any statutory provisions, tradition has been an important factor in preserving judicial independence both in England and in Canada. In England a majority of the judges can be removed by the Lord Chancellor, who is an active member of the Government. However, the high tradition of the office of Lord Chancellor has resulted in very few abuses of this power. As Hogg states in his text Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), p. 120:
> > The independence of the judiciary has since become such a powerful tradition in the United Kingdom and Canada that there may be little point in a fine analysis of the language of the provisions by which it is formally guaranteed.
> Shetreet's text Judges on Trial, a Study of the Appointment and Accountability of the English Judiciary (1976), emphasized the importance of tradition so far as judicial independence is concerned. At pp. 392-3 he stated:
> > ... no executive or legislature can interfere with judicial independence contrary to popular opinion, and survive. "In Britain" wrote Professor de Smith, "the independence of the Judiciary rests not on formal constitutional guarantees and prohibitions but on an admixture of statutory and common-law rules, constitutional conventions and parliamentary practice, fortified by professional tradition and public opinion." (S.A. de Smith Constitutional and Administrative Law (1st ed. 1971), pp. 365-366 n. 35) Lord Sankey, L.C., said in Parliament:
> > > "The independence and prestige which our judges have enjoyed in their position have rested far more upon the great tradition and long usage with which rôle de la tradition en tant que condition ou garantie objectives de l'indépendance judiciaire. Étant donné que la tradition est, la plupart du temps, invoquée relativement à la question de l'inamovibilité, il convient d'examiner ici son rôle général.

À ce propos, je cite un passage des motifs de jugement du juge en chef Howland qui se réfère aux opinions de plusieurs savants glossateurs sur l'importance de la tradition. Il dit aux pp. 431 et 432:

> > L'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire est devenue depuis une tradition tellement puissante au Royaume-Uni et au Canada que procéder à une analyse subtile des textes qui la garantissent formellement n'aurait guère d'utilité.
> La monographie de Shetreet, Judges on Trial, a Study of the Appointment and Accountability of the English Judiciary (1976), souligne l'importance de la tradition en ce qui concerne l'indépendance judiciaire. Aux pages 392 et 393, il dit:
> > ... aucun exécutif ou corps législatif ne peut porter atteinte à l'indépendance judiciaire contrairement à l'opinion publique, et survivre. «En Grande-Bretagne, écrit le professeur de Smith, l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire repose non sur des garanties et prohibitions constitutionnelles formelles, mais sur un mélange de règles de droit écrit et de common law, de conventions constitutionnelles et de pratiques parlementaires, fortifiées par la tradition du monde juridique et l'opinion publique.» (S. A. de Smith, Constitutional and Administrative Law (1st ed. 1971), aux pp. 365 et 366, note 35). Le lord chancelier Sankey a dit au Parlement:
> > > «L'indépendance et le prestige dont nos juges jouissent en occupant leur charge reposent beaucoup plus sur la grande tradition et le long usage qui les they have always been surrounded, than upon any Statute. The greatest safeguard of all may be found along these lines for traditions cannot be repealed, but an Act of Parliament can be."

The strength of tradition is measured not only by its observance but also by the intensity of the reaction to its violation .... Strong public reaction to a breach of tradition demonstrates that the violation will not pass unnoticed.

To these opinions on the importance of tradition as a safeguard of judicial independence may be added the following statement by Lord Denning in The Road to Justice (1955), at pp. 16-17:

The County Court judges have some measure of protection but the stipendiary magistrates and the justices of the peace have no security of tenure at all. They hold office during pleasure ....

Nevertheless, although these lesser judges can theoretically be dismissed at pleasure, the great principle that judges should be independent has become so ingrained in us that it extends in practice to them also. They do in fact hold office during good behaviour and they are in fact only dismissed for misconduct. If any Minister or Government Department should attempt to influence the decision of any one of them, there would be such an outcry that no Government could stand against it.

Tradition, reinforced by public opinion, operating as an effective restraint upon executive or legislative action, is undoubtedly a very important objective condition tending to ensure the independence in fact of a tribunal. That it is not, however, regarded by itself as a sufficient safeguard of judicial independence is indicated by the many calls for specific legislative provisions or constitutional guarantees to ensure that independence in a more ample and secure measure. Shetreet himself makes this point later on in the discussion of the role of tradition from which Howland C.J.O. quoted, where he says at pp. 392-93:

Others, however, do not entertain this unreserved trust in tradition and popular opinion. A growing number of legal scholars, lawyers and even judges are advocating a written and entrenched constitution to protect civil liberties and other important parts of constitutional law against alteration by a small temporary majority in Parliament. Significant support for this view came from Lord Justice Scarman, who in his Hamlyn ont toujours entourés que sur quelque loi. La meilleure garantie peut s'y trouver, car les traditions ne peuvent être abrogées, alors qu'une loi du Parlement peut l'être.»

La force de la tradition se mesure non seulement par son observance, mais aussi par l'intensité de la réaction que soulève sa violation ... Une forte réaction de l'opinion publique à une atteinte à la tradition démontre qu'une violation ne saurait passer inaperçue.

À ces opinions sur l'importance de la tradition comme garantie de l'indépendance judiciaire, on peut ajouter ce que dit lord Denning dans The Road to Justice (1955), aux pp. 16 et 17:

Néanmoins, si ces juges d'instance inférieure sont théoriquement amovibles, le grand principe que les juges doivent être indépendants est tellement ancré en nous qu'il s'applique en pratique à eux aussi. Ils sont en fait inamovibles et ne peuvent être révoqués que pour mauvaise conduite. Si un ministre ou un ministère tentait d'influencer la décision de l'un deux, cela soulèverait un tel tollé qu'aucun gouvernement ne pourrait y résister.

La tradition, renforcée par l'opinion publique, joue le rôle d'un frein efficace à l'action de l'exécutif ou du législatif et constitue sans nul doute une condition objective fort importante qui tend à assurer l'indépendance effective d'un tribunal. Que cela n'est pas cependant considéré en soi comme une garantie suffisante de l'indépendance judiciaire ressort des nombreux appels réclamant des dispositions législatives ou des garanties constitutionnelles spécifiques assurant cette indépendance d'une manière plus large et plus certaine. Shetreet lui-même le dit plus loin dans son analyse du rôle de la tradition, que cite le juge en chef Howland, aux pp. 392 et 393:

Lectures 1974 proposed a written Bill of Rights and judicial review of statutes. Individual rights, judicial independence and other parts of a democratic system of government can be better safeguarded by a written constitution supported by tradition and public opinion than by the latter alone.

Reports and addresses on judicial independence in recent years have indicated that the nature and importance of this constitutional value are not so well and widely understood as to give grounds for confidence that its protection can be safely left to the operation of tradition alone. This is clear, for example, from the observations and recommendations of the Deschênes report and from the recent report of the Canadian Bar Association committee on judicial independence. Indeed, a constitutional requirement of judicial independence such as that in s. 11(d) of the Charter presupposes that it does not automatically exist by reason of tradition alone. Important as tradition is as a support of judicial independence, I do not think that reliance on it should go so far as to treat other conditions or guarantees of independence as unnecessary or of no practical importance. I do not read the reasons of the Court of Appeal as suggesting that. It is a question of the relative importance that one is going to attach to tradition in a particular context as ensuring respect for judicial independence despite an apparent or potential power to interfere with it. Moreover, while tradition reinforced by public opinion may operate as a restraint upon the exercise of power in a manner that interferes with judicial independence, it cannot supply essential conditions of independence for which specific provision of law is necessary.

With the greatest respect for the contrary view, where, as in the case of provincial court judges at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction, the legislature has expressly provided for two kinds of tenure—one under which a judge may be removed from office only for cause and the other under which a judge of the same court holds office during pleasure—I am of the opinion that the du lord juge Scarman qui, dans ses Hamlyn Lectures de 1974, a proposé une déclaration des droits écrite et le contrôle judiciaire des lois. Les droits de l'individu, l'indépendance judiciaire et d'autres aspects d'un système démocratique de gouvernement pourraient être mieux protégés par une constitution écrite, appuyée par la tradition et l'opinion publique, que par cette dernière seulement.

Ces dernières années, des rapports et des allocutions sur l'indépendance judiciaire ont montré que la nature et l'importance de cette valeur constitutionnelle ne sont pas si bien et si largement comprises au point de justifier de croire que cette protection peut, en toute sécurité, être laissée à la tradition seule. Cela ressort clairement, par exemple, des observations et des recommandations du rapport Deschênes et du récent rapport du Comité de l'Association du Barreau canadien sur l'indépendance de la magistrature. D'ailleurs, une exigence constitutionnelle d'indépendance judiciaire, comme celle de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte, présuppose qu'elle n'existe pas automatiquement en raison de la tradition seule. Si importante que soit la tradition en tant que support de l'indépendance judiciaire, je ne pense pas qu'on devrait s'y fier au point de considérer que les autres conditions ou garanties d'indépendance sont inutiles ou sans importance pratique. Suivant mon interprétation, les motifs de la Cour d'appel ne laissent pas entendre cela. Il s'agit plutôt de l'importance relative à donner à la tradition, dans un contexte particulier, en tant que moyen d'assurer le respect de l'indépendance judiciaire malgré l'existence d'un pouvoir apparent ou virtuel d'y porter atteinte. En outre, si la tradition, renforcée par l'opinion publique, peut permettre de freiner l'exercice d'un pouvoir qui porte atteinte à l'indépendance judiciaire, elle ne peut fournir les conditions essentielles d'indépendance qui doivent être prévues expressément par la loi.

Avec le plus grand respect pour les tenants de l'opinion contraire, lorsque, comme dans le cas des juges de cour provinciale à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, le corps législatif a prévu expressément deux genres de charge, l'une où un juge peut être révoqué uniquement pour un motif déterminé, et l'autre où un juge du même tribunal est nommé à titre amovible, j'estime que second class of tenure cannot reasonably be perceived as meeting the essential requirement of security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. The reasonable perception is that the legislature has deliberately, in the case of one category of judges, reserved to the Executive the right to terminate the holding of office without the necessity of any particular justification and without any inhibition or restraint arising from perceived tradition. I am thus of the view that a judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) who held office during pleasure at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction could not be an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter.

This conclusion could not, however, affect the independence of Sharpe J. personally because, as noted by the Court of Appeal, he did not hold office under a post-retirement reappointment. It was, nevertheless, contended that the provision for post-retirement reappointment at pleasure prevented the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) as a whole from being an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter. In my opinion, the fact that certain judges of the Court may have held office during pleasure at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction could not impair or destroy the independence of the Court as a whole. The objection would have to be taken to the status of the particular judge constituting the tribunal.

As a further reason for rejecting the objections to the provision for post-retirement reappointment Howland C.J.O. referred to the declared intention of the Attorney General to introduce legislation at the next session of the legislature to make post-retirement reappointment subject to the approval of the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court. Such legislation was in fact introduced by s. 1 of the Provincial Courts Amendment Act, 1983, 1983 (Ont.) c. 18, which came into force on May 26, 1983 and amended s. 5(4) of the Provincial Courts Act to permit a provincial court judge who has attained the age of retirement to continue in office, with the annual approval of the chief judge of the court, until the age of seventy, and to continue in la charge du second genre ne peut être raisonnablement perçue comme satisfaisant à l'exigence essentielle d'inamovibilité pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Il est raisonnable de croire que le corps législatif a délibérément, dans le cas d'une catégorie de juges, réservé à l'exécutif le droit de mettre fin à une charge, sans qu'aucune justification particulière ne soit nécessaire et sans aucune inhibition ou restriction imposée par une certaine perception de la tradition. Je suis donc d'avis qu'un juge de la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), qui occupait sa charge à titre amovible à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, ne pouvait pas être un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte.

Cette conclusion ne peut toutefois influer sur l'indépendance du juge Sharpe personnellement parce que, comme l'a noté la Cour d'appel, il n'occupait pas sa charge en vertu d'une nouvelle nomination faite après qu'il eut atteint l'âge de la retraite. On a néanmoins soutenu que la disposition sur la nouvelle nomination à titre amovible, après l'âge de la retraite, empêchait la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), dans son ensemble, d'être un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. À mon avis, le fait que certains juges de la cour aient pu occuper leur charge à titre amovible, au moment où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, ne saurait altérer ni détruire l'indépendance de la cour dans son ensemble. L'objection aurait dû viser le statut du juge particulier qui constituait le tribunal saisi.

Comme motif supplémentaire de rejet des objections apportées à la disposition relative aux nouvelles nominations après l'âge de la retraite, le juge en chef Howland a mentionné l'intention déclarée du procureur général de présenter, à la session suivante de l'Assemblée législative, un projet de loi qui assujettirait ces nouvelles nominations après l'âge de la retraite à l'approbation du juge en chef de la Cour provinciale. Cette mesure a en fait été déposée; c'est l'art. 1 de la Loi de 1983 modifiant la Loi sur les cours provinciales, 1983 (Ont.), chap. 18, qui est entré en vigueur le 26 mai 1983 et a modifié le par. 5(4) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales pour permettre à un juge de cour provinciale ayant atteint l'âge de la retraite de office thereafter until the age of seventy-five, with the annual approval of the Judicial Council for Provincial Judges, a body composed of the Chief Justice of Ontario, the Chief Justice of the High Court, the Chief Justice of the District Court, the Chief Judges of the various divisions of the Provincial Court, the Treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and not more than two other persons appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. The same provision is now found in s. 54(4) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, which came into force on January 1, 1985. This change in the law, while creating a post-retirement status that is by no means ideal from the point of view of security of tenure, may be said to have removed the principal objection to the provision which applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction since it replaces the discretion of the Executive by the judgment and approval of senior judicial officers who may be reasonably perceived as likely to act exclusively out of consideration for the interests of the Court and the administration of justice generally.

The second essential condition of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter is, in my opinion, what may be referred to as financial security. That means security of salary or other remuneration, and, where appropriate, security of pension. The essence of such security is that the right to salary and pension should be established by law and not be subject to arbitrary interference by the Executive in a manner that could affect judicial independence. In the case of pension, the essential distinction is between a right to a pension and a pension that depends on the grace or favour of the Executive.

The salaries of provincial court judges were at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction, and still are, fixed by regulation made by the Lieutenant Governor in Council pursuant to the authority formerly conferred by s. 34(1) of the Provincial continuer d'occuper sa charge, avec l'approbation annuelle du juge en chef de la cour, jusqu'à l'âge de soixante-dix ans, et de continuer à siéger par la suite jusqu'à l'âge de soixante-quinze ans, avec l'approbation annuelle du Conseil de la magistrature pour les juges de la Cour provinciale, composé du juge en chef de l'Ontario, du juge en chef de la Haute Cour, du juge en chef de la Cour de district, des juges en chef des diverses divisions de la Cour provinciale, du trésorier de la Law Society of Upper Canada et d'au plus deux autres personnes nommées par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil. La même disposition se retrouve maintenant au par. 54(4) de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires, qui est entrée en vigueur le 1er janvier 1985. Ce changement dans la loi, même s'il crée un statut d'après-retraite qui est loin d'être idéal du point de vue de l'inamovibilité, peut être considéré comme ayant supprimé l'objection principale apportée à la disposition qui s'appliquait lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, puisqu'il remplace le pouvoir discrétionnaire de l'exécutif par le jugement et l'approbation d'officiers de justice supérieurs qu'on peut raisonnablement percevoir comme susceptibles d'agir exclusivement en fonction des intérêts de la cour et de l'administration de la justice en général.

La deuxième condition essentielle de l'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte est, à mon avis, ce que l'on pourrait appeler la sécurité financière. Cela veut dire un traitement ou autre rémunération assurés et, le cas échéant, une pension assurée. Cette sécurité consiste essentiellement en ce que le droit au traitement et à la pension soit prévu par la loi et ne soit pas sujet aux ingérences arbitraires de l'exécutif, d'une manière qui pourrait affecter l'indépendance judiciaire. Dans le cas de la pension, la distinction essentielle est entre un droit à une pension et une pension qui dépend du bon vouloir ou des bonnes grâces de l'exécutif.

Les traitements des juges de cour provinciale étaient, à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, et le sont toujours, fixés par règlement pris par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil, conformément à l'autorité que lui conférait aupa-

Courts Act and now conferred by s. 87(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, which came into force on January 1, 1985. The amount of the salary has been fixed by s. 2 of Regulation 811 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1980, as amended from time to time. The government receives recommendations concerning the salaries of provincial court judges from the Ontario Provincial Courts Committee, which was first established by Order in Council 643/80 dated March 5, 1980 and was later given statutory recognition by s. 2(2) of the Provincial Judges and Masters Statute Law Amendment Act, 1983, 1983 (Ont.), c. 78, which added a new s. 35 to the Provincial Courts Act, establishing the Committee with three members: one appointed by provincial court and family court judges' associations; one appointed by the government; and the third, the chairman, appointed jointly by the associations and the government. Section 35 provided that the annual report and recommendations of the Committee be laid before the Legislative Assembly. The same provision is now made for the Committee and its role in relation to the remuneration, allowances and benefits of provincial court judges in s. 88 of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, which came into force on January 1, 1985.

The principal objections to the manner in which the salaries of provincial court judges are provided for is that they are not fixed by the legislature and they are not made a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund. These two requirements have traditionally been regarded as affording the highest degree of security in respect of judicial salaries. Section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 requires that the salaries of superior, district and county court judges be fixed by Parliament. The salaries of these and other federally-appointed judges are fixed by Parliament in the Judges Act, which provides in s. 33(1) that the salaries payable under the Act shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. In all of the other provinces the salaries of provincial judges are, as in Ontario, fixed by the executive government by regulation.

ravant le par. 34(1) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, et que lui confère maintenant le par. 87(1) de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires, entrée en vigueur le 1er janvier 1985. Le montant du traitement est fixé par l'art. 2 du règlement 811 des Règlements refondus de l'Ontario de 1980 et ses modifications. Le gouvernement reçoit des recommandations concernant les traitements des juges de cour provinciale de l'Ontario Provincial Courts Committee qui a été établi initialement par le décret 643/80 en date du 5 mars 1980 et qui, par la suite a reçu reconnaissance légale par le par. 2(2) de la Provincial Judges and Masters Statute Law Amendment Act, 1983, 1983 (Ont.), chap. 78, qui a ajouté à la Loi sur les cours provinciales un nouvel art. 35 créant un comité formé de trois membres: un membre nommé par les associations des juges de cour provinciale et de cour de la famille, un membre nommé par le gouvernement et, troisièmement, le président, nommé conjointement par les associations et le gouvernement. L'article 35 prévoyait que le rapport annuel et les recommandations du comité, devaient être déposés à l'Assemblée législative. On trouve maintenant la même disposition, concernant le comité et son rôle en matière de rémunération, d'allocations et de bénéfices pour les juges de cour provinciale, à l'art. 88 de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires, entrée en vigueur le 1er janvier 1985.

La principale objection apportée à la façon dont les traitements des juges de cour provinciale sont fixés, est qu'ils ne sont pas fixés par le corps législatif et qu'ils ne grèvent pas le Fonds du revenu consolidé. Ces deux conditions ont traditionnellement été considérées comme offrant le plus haut degré de sécurité en matière de traitement des juges. L'article 100 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 requiert que les traitements des juges des cours supérieures, de district et de comté, soient fixés par le Parlement. Les traitements de ceux-ci et des autres juges de nomination fédérale sont fixés par le législateur fédéral dans la Loi sur les juges qui prévoit, au par. 33(1), que les traitements payables en vertu de cette loi seront prélevés sur le Fonds du revenu consolidé. Dans toutes les autres provinces, les traitements des juges de cour provinciale sont, comme en Ontario, fixés par règlement par le pouvoir exécutif. Dans certaines

In some, but not all provinces, they are paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Although it may be theoretically preferable that judicial salaries should be fixed by the legislature rather than the executive government and should be made a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund rather than requiring annual appropriation, I do not think that either of these features should be regarded as essential to the financial security that may be reasonably perceived as sufficient for independence under s. 11(d) of the Charter. At the present time in Canada the amount of judges' salaries is a matter for the initiative of the Executive, whether they are fixed by act of the legislature or by regulation. Moreover, it is far from clear that having to bring proposed increases to judges' salaries before the legislature is more desirable from the point of view of judicial independence, and indeed adequate salaries, than having the question determined by the Executive alone, pursuant to a general legislative authority. In the case of the salaries of provincial court judges in Ontario, assurance that proper consideration will be given to the adequacy of judicial salaries is provided by the role assigned to the Ontario Provincial Courts Committee, although I do not consider the existence of such a committee to be essential to security of salary for purposes of s. 11(d). The essential point, in my opinion, is that the right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the Executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge. Making judicial salaries a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund instead of having to include them in annual appropriations is, I suppose, theoretically a measure of greater security, but practically it is impossible that the legislature would refuse to vote the annual appropriation in order to attempt to exercise some control or influence over a class of judges as a whole. For these reasons I am of the opinion that under the provisions of law which applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction and which now apply, provincial court judges may be reasonably perceived to have the provinces, mais non dans toutes, ils sont prélevés à même le Fonds du revenu consolidé.

Bien qu'il puisse être théoriquement préférable que les traitements des juges soient fixés par le corps législatif, plutôt que par le pouvoir exécutif, et qu'ils grèvent le Fonds du revenu consolidé, plutôt que d'exiger une affectation de crédit annuelle, je ne pense pas que l'une ou l'autre de ces caractéristiques doive être considérée comme essentielle à la sécurité financière qui peut être raisonnablement perçue comme suffisante pour assurer l'indépendance au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. À l'heure actuelle au Canada, le montant du traitement des juges est laissé à l'initiative de l'exécutif peu importe qu'ils soient fixés par une loi ou par règlement. De plus, il est loin d'être clair que l'obligation de soumettre au corps législatif les projets de hausses de traitement des juges soit plus souhaitable du point de vue de l'indépendance judiciaire et, d'ailleurs, de celui d'un traitement adéquat, que de laisser à l'exécutif le soin de régler la question seul, conformément à une autorisation législative générale. Dans le cas des traitements des juges de cour provinciale en Ontario, le rôle assigné à l'Ontario Provincial Courts Committee donne l'assurance qu'on veillera dûment à ce que les traitements des juges soient suffisants, quoique je n'estime pas que l'existence de ce comité soit essentielle à la sécurité de traitement pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*). L'essentiel, à mon avis, est que le droit du juge de cour provinciale à un traitement soit prévu par la loi et qu'en aucune manière l'exécutif ne puisse empiéter sur ce droit de façon à affecter l'indépendance du juge pris individuellement. Faire en sorte que les traitements des juges grèvent le Fonds du revenu consolidé, plutôt que d'avoir à les inclure dans les affectations annuelles de crédit est, je suppose, une mesure de sûreté plus grande théoriquement mais, en pratique, il est impossible que le corps législatif refuse de voter l'affectation de crédit annuelle dans le but de tenter d'exercer un contrôle ou d'influer sur une catégorie de juges dans son ensemble. Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis qu'en vertu des dispositions législatives qui s'appliquaient lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence et qui s'appliquent aujourd'hui, on peut raisonnablement considérer que les juges de cour provinciale jouissent de la essential security of salary required for independence within the meaning of s. 11(d).

Although at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction s. 34(1) of the Provincial Courts Act empowered the Lieutenant Governor in Council to make provision by regulation for the pensions of provincial court judges, no such regulation had been adopted. The right to pension enjoyed by provincial court judges was that provided for members of the public service by the Public Service Superannuation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 419, which was made applicable by s. 26 to every full time provincial judge. It was not until May 25, 1984 that Ontario Regulation 332/84 under the Provincial Courts Act was adopted making special provision for the pensions of provincial court judges.

The chief objection to the provision for pension which applied when Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction was, as I understood the argument, that it treated provincial court judges in the same way as civil servants. Indeed, the same objection was made to the provision for other benefits of a financial nature, such as sick leave with pay and group insurance benefits of various kinds. The provisions which governed these benefits in Ontario Regulation 881, under the Public Service Act were made applicable to provincial court judges by s. 7 of Ontario Regulation 811, under the Provincial Courts Act. It was not until May 25, 1984 that Ontario Regulation 332/84, to which reference has been made, made special provision for such benefits in the case of provincial court judges, although some of the provisions in Ontario Regulation 881, that had been made applicable to provincial court judges continued to apply to them.

In my opinion this objection to the provisions for pension and other financial benefits which were applicable to provincial court judges at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction does not touch an essential condition of the independence required by s. 11(d). The provisions established a right to pension and other benefits which could not be sécurité de traitement essentielle pour être indépendants au sens de l'al. 11*d*).

Bien que, à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, le par. 34(1) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales habilitait le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil à pourvoir par règlement aux pensions des juges de cour provinciale, aucun règlement de ce genre n'a été adopté. Le droit à une pension, dont jouissent les juges de cour provinciale, était celui prévu pour les fonctionnaires par la Loi sur le régime de retraite des fonctionnaires, L.R.O. 1980, chap. 419, rendue applicable, en vertu de son art. 26, à tout juge de cour provinciale à plein temps. Ce n'est que le 25 mai 1984 que le Règlement de l'Ontario 332/84, adopté en vertu de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, a prévu par une disposition spéciale des pensions pour les juges de cour provinciale.

La principale objection apportée à la disposition sur la pension qui s'appliquait lorsque le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence était, si j'ai bien compris l'argument, qu'elle traitait les juges de cour provinciale comme des fonctionnaires. D'ailleurs, la même objection a été apportée à la disposition régissant d'autres avantages de nature financière, comme les congés de maladie payés et les indemnités d'assurance-groupe de divers genres. Les dispositions qui régissent ces avantages dans le Règlement de l'Ontario 881, pris en application de la Loi sur la fonction publique, ont été rendues applicables aux juges de cour provinciale par l'art. 7 du Règlement de l'Ontario 811, pris en application de la Loi sur les cours provinciales. Ce n'est que le 25 mai 1984 que le Règlement de l'Ontario 332/84, déjà mentionné, a prévu spécialement ces avantages dans le cas des juges de cour provinciale, bien que certaines des dispositions du Règlement de l'Ontario 881, qui avaient été étendues aux juges de cour provinciale, aient continué de leur être applicables.

À mon avis, cette objection apportée aux dispositions relatives à la pension et aux autres avantages financiers, qui étaient applicables aux juges de cour provinciale à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, ne touche pas une condition essentielle de l'indépendance requise par l'al. 11*d*). Ces dispositions créent un droit à une pension et à interfered with by the Executive on a discretionary or arbitrary basis. That, as I have indicated, is the essential requirement for purposes of s. 11(d). Making the provisions governing civil servants applicable to the provincial court judges did not purport to characterize provincial judges as civil servants or increase the discretionary control of the Executive over the judges. It may well be preferable that the pensions and other financial benefits of judges should be given special and separate treatment in the law, as they now are, because of the special position and requirements of judges in this respect, but the application of the civil standards to provincial court judges at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction did not, for the reasons I have indicated, affect their essential security in respect of pensions and benefits.

VI

The third essential condition of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) is in my opinion the institutional independence of the tribunal with respect to matters of administration bearing directly on the exercise of its judicial function. The degree to which the judiciary should ideally have control over the administration of the courts is a major issue with respect to judicial independence today. Howland C.J.O. drew a distinction, for purposes of the issues in the appeal, between adjudicative independence and administrative independence, which is reflected in the following passages from his reasons for judgment at pp. 432-33:

When considering the independence of the judiciary, it is necessary to draw a careful distinction between independent adjudication and independent administration. It is independent adjudication about which the Court is concerned in this appeal. The position of the judiciary under the English and Canadian Constitutions is quite different from that under the American Constitution. In the United States the federal judiciary is a separate branch which includes judicial administration. While the report of Chief Justice Jules Deschênes, "Masters in their Own House", September, 1981, recommended the independent judicial administration of the courts, the Canadian Judicial Council, in Septem-d'autres avantages qui ne peut pas faire l'objet d'une atteinte discrétionnaire ou arbitraire de l'exécutif. C'est là, comme je l'ai dit, l'exigence essentielle pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*). Rendre applicables aux juges de cour provinciale les dispositions régissant les fonctionnaires n'avait pas pour but de qualifier de fonctionnaires les juges de cour provinciale, ni d'accroître le contrôle discrétionnaire de l'exécutif sur les juges. Il est sans doute préférable que les pensions et autres avantages financiers des juges reçoivent un traitement spécial et distinct dans la loi, comme c'est maintenant le cas, vu la situation et les exigences spéciales des juges à cet égard, mais l'application de normes de la Fonction publique aux juges de cour provinciale à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence n'a pas, pour les raisons que j'ai données, affecté leur sécurité essentielle en matière de pensions et d'avantages.

VI

La troisième condition essentielle de l'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) est, à mon avis, l'indépendance institutionnelle du tribunal relativement aux questions administratives qui ont directement un effet sur l'exercice de ses fonctions judiciaires. Le degré de contrôle que le pouvoir judiciaire devrait idéalement exercer sur l'administration des tribunaux est un point majeur de l'indépendance judiciaire aujourd'hui. Le juge en chef Howland a fait la distinction, pour les fins des questions visées par l'appel, entre l'indépendance en matière de décisions et l'indépendance en matière d'administration, qu'on trouve dans les passages suivants de ses motifs de jugement aux pp. 432 et 433:

[TRADUCTION] Lorsqu'on étudie l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire, il est nécessaire de distinguer soigneusement entre l'indépendance en matière de décisions et l'indépendance en matière d'administration. C'est l'indépendance en matière de décisions qui intéresse la cour dans le présent appel. La situation du pouvoir judiciaire sous le régime des constitutions anglaise et canadienne est fort différente de celle sous le régime de la constitution américaine. Aux États-Unis, la magistrature fédérale est un pouvoir distinct qui comprend l'administration judiciaire. Si le rapport du juge en chef Jules Deschênes, «Maîtres chez eux», en date de septembre 1981, a recommandé que l'administration ber, 1982, only approved of the first two stages of consultation and decision sharing between the Executive and the Judiciary and was not prepared to approve at that time of the third stage of independent judicial administration.

In Ontario, the primary role of the judiciary is adjudication. The Executive on the other hand is responsible for providing the court rooms and the court staff. The assignment of judges, the sittings of the court, and the court lists are all matters for the judiciary. The Executive must not interfere with, or attempt to influence the adjudicative function of the judiciary. However, there must necessarily be reasonable management constraints. At times there may be a fine line between interference with adjudication and proper management controls. The heads of the judiciary have to work closely with the representatives of the Executive unless the judiciary is given full responsibility for judicial administration.

> On the hearing of this appeal, no submission was made that the Attorney General in his role as prosecutor interfered in any way with the sittings of the court, its lists, or the process of adjudication.

Judicial control over the matters referred to by Howland C.J.O.—assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists—as well as the related matters of allocation of court rooms and direction of the administrative staff engaged in carrying out these functions, has generally been considered the essential or minimum requirement for institutional or "collective" independence. See Lederman, "The Independence of the Judiciary" in The Canadian Judiciary (1976, ed. A. M. Linden), pp. 9-10; Deschênes, Masters in their own house, pp. 81 and 124.

As the reasons of Howland C.J.O. indicate, however, the claim for greater administrative autonomy or independence for the courts goes considerably beyond these matters. The insistence is chiefly on a stronger or more independent role in the financial aspects of court administration—budgetary preparation and presentation and allojudiciaire des tribunaux soit indépendante, le Conseil canadien de la magistrature, en septembre 1982, n'a approuvé que les deux premiers stades, ceux de la consultation et du partage des décisions entre le pouvoir exécutif et le pouvoir judiciaire, n'étant pas prêt à approuver à cette époque le troisième stade, celui d'une administration judiciaire indépendante.

En Ontario, le rôle premier du pouvoir judiciaire est de rendre des décisions. L'exécutif, d'autre part, a la responsabilité de fournir les salles d'audience et le personnel judiciaire. L'assignation des juges à une cause, les séances de la cour et son rôle relèvent tous du pouvoir judiciaire. L'exécutif ne doit pas s'immiscer dans la fonction décisionnelle du pouvoir judiciaire ni tenter de l'influencer. Toutefois, il doit nécessairement y avoir des contraintes raisonnables de gestion. Parfois la démarcation entre l'immixtion dans la fonction décisionnelle et les contrôles adéquats de gestion est ténue. Les responsables du pouvoir judiciaire doivent collaborer étroitement avec les représentants de l'exécutif à moins que le pouvoir judiciaire ne se voie conférer l'entière responsabilité de l'administration judiciaire.

Le contrôle judiciaire sur les questions mentionnées par le juge en chef Howland, savoir l'assignation des juges aux causes, les séances de la cour, le rôle de la cour, ainsi que les domaines connexes de l'allocation de salles d'audience et de la direction du personnel administratif qui exerce ces fonctions, a généralement été considéré comme essentiel ou comme une exigence minimale de l'indépendance institutionnelle ou «collective». Voir Lederman, «The Independence of the Judiciary», dans The Canadian Judiciary (1976, ed. A. M. Linden), aux pp. 9 et 10; Deschênes, Maîtres chez eux, aux pp. 83, 84 et 130.

Cependant, comme l'indiquent les motifs du juge en chef Howland, la demande d'une plus grande autonomie ou indépendance administrative pour les tribunaux va beaucoup plus loin que cela. On insiste surtout sur un rôle plus important et plus autonome dans les aspects financiers de l'administration d'un tribunal, dont la préparation du cation of expenditure—and in the personnel aspects of administration—the recruitment, classification, promotion, remuneration, and supervision of the necessary support staff. Probably the fullest exposition of the recommended enlargement of administrative autonomy or independence for the courts is to be found in the Deschênes report, with its three stage proposal for realization referred to by Howland C.J.O. consisting of consultation, decision sharing and independence. Strong support for the Deschênes recommendations in this area was recently expressed in the report of the Canadian Bar Association's Committee on judicial independence, which, while noting the reservations referred to by Howland C.J.O. concerning the third stage of full administrative autonomy or independence, recommended that the first two stages of consultation and decision sharing be implemented as soon as possible. The desirability of greater administrative independence, particularly with respect to financial and personnel matters, has also been the subject of important public addresses by leaders of the judiciary. In an address entitled "Some Observations on Judicial Independence" in 1980 the late Chief Justice Laskin had this to say on the subject:

Coming now to other elements which I regard as desirable supports for judicial independence, I count among them independence in budgeting and in expenditure of an approved budget, and independence in administration, covering not only the operation of the Courts but also the appointment and supervision of the supporting staff. Budget independence does not mean that Judges should be allowed to fix their own salaries; it means simply that the budget should not be part of any departmental budget but should be separately presented and dealt with. I do not, of course, preclude its presentation by a responsible Minister, but he should do this as a conduit, and yet as one able to support the budget after its preparation under the direction of the Chief Justice or Chief Judge and the chief administrative officer of the Court. So, too, should the Court, through its Chief Justice or Chief Judge and chief administrative officer, have supervision and direction of the staff of the Court budget et la présentation et la répartition des dépenses, et dans les aspects de l'administration qui concernent le personnel, comme le recrutement, la classification, la promotion, la rémunération et la supervision du personnel de soutien nécessaire. Probablement l'exposé le plus complet de l'élargissement recommandé de l'autonomie ou de l'indépendance administrative des tribunaux se trouve dans le rapport Deschênes, et sa proposition en trois stades de réalisation, que mentionne le juge en chef Howland, comprenant la consultation, la participation et l'indépendance. Les recommandations Deschênes dans ce domaine ont récemment reçu l'appui, non négligeable, du rapport du Comité de l'Association du Barreau canadien sur l'indépendance de la magistrature qui, tout en prenant note des réserves que mentionne le juge en chef Howland concernant le troisième stade, celui de l'indépendance ou de l'autonomie administrative totale, a recommandé que les deux premiers stades de la consultation et de la participation soient mis en œuvre dès que possible. Le caractère souhaitable d'une plus grande indépendance administrative, particulièrement dans les domaines des finances et du personnel, a aussi fait l'objet d'allocutions publiques importantes de la part des leaders du pouvoir judiciaire. Dans un discours intitulé [TRADUCTION] «Quelques observations sur l'indépendance judiciaire», en 1980, feu le juge en chef Laskin avait eu ceci à dire à ce sujet:

and of the various supporting services such as the library and the Court's law reports.

The present Chief Justice of Canada, in his recent address to the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, referred with approval to this statement of Laskin C.J. and said that "Preparation of judicial budgets and distribution of allocated resources should be under the control of the Chief Justices of the various courts, not the Ministers of Justice" and "Control over finance and administration must be accompanied by control over the adequacy and direction of support staff".

It is not entirely clear as to the extent to which the issue of institutional independence is actually raised by the various objections to the status of provincial court judges at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction. As I understood the argument, the chief objection which could be said to relate to institutional independence was the extent to which the judges were treated as civil servants for purposes of pension and other financial benefits, such as group insurance and sick leave, and the control exercised by the Executive over such discretionary benefits or advantages as post-retirement reappointment, leave of absence with or without pay and the right to engage in extra-judicial employment. The contention was that the treatment of these matters and the executive control over them were calculated to make the Court appear as a branch of the Executive and the judges as civil servants. This impression, it was said, was reinforced by the manner in which the Court and its judges were associated with the Ministry of the Attorney General in printed material intended for public information. Dependence on the Executive for discretionary benefits or advantages was also said to affect the reality and the perception of the individual independence of the judges, an issue which must be considered separately from the question of institutional independence.

Although the increased measure of administrative autonomy or independence that is being recommended for the courts, or some degree of it, de son personnel et des divers services de soutien, tels la bibliothèque et les recueils de jurisprudence de la cour.

L'actuel Juge en chef du Canada, dans un récent discours à l'assemblée annuelle de l'Association du Barreau canadien, s'est référé à ce qu'avait dit le juge en chef Laskin, l'approuvant et disant que [TRADUCTION] «La préparation des budgets judiciaires et la répartition des ressources allouées devraient être sous le contrôle des juges en chef des divers tribunaux, et non des ministres de la justice» et [TRADUCTION] «Le contrôle sur les finances et l'administration doit être assorti du contrôle sur la compétence et la direction du personnel de soutien.»

On ne voit pas tout à fait clairement dans quelle mesure la question de l'indépendance constitutionnelle est vraiment posée par les diverses objections apportées au statut des juges de cour provinciale de l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence. Si je comprends bien l'argument, l'objection principale qui serait apportée en matière d'indépendance institutionnelle aurait trait à la mesure dans laquelle les juges étaient considérés comme des fonctionnaires aux fins des pensions et d'autres avantages financiers, tels l'assurance-groupe, les congés de maladie et le contrôle qu'exerce l'exécutif sur des bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires comme les nouvelles nominations après l'âge de la retraite, les congés payés ou non payés et le droit de s'adonner à des activités extrajudiciaires. On a soutenu que la façon de traiter ces questions et le contrôle de l'exécutif sur celles-ci étaient conçus de manière à faire percevoir la cour comme un organe de l'exécutif et les juges, comme des fonctionnaires. Cette impression, a-t-on dit, était renforcée par la manière dont la cour et ses juges étaient associés au ministère du Procureur général dans les brochures destinées à informer le public. La dépendance envers l'exécutif dans le cas des bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires, a-t-on ajouté, influait sur l'indépendance véritable des juges, pris individuellement, et sur l'idée qu'on s'en faisait, un point qui doit être examiné indépendamment de la question de l'indépendance institutionnelle.

Si la plus grande autonomie ou indépendance administrative qu'il est recommandé d'accorder aux tribunaux, ou une partie de celle-ci, peut se may well be highly desirable, it cannot in my opinion be regarded as essential for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. The essentials of institutional independence which may be reasonably perceived as sufficient for purposes of s. 11(d) must, I think, be those referred to by Howland C.J.O. They may be summed up as judicial control over the administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of the judicial function. To the extent that the distinction between administrative independence and adjudicative independence is intended to reflect that limitation, I can see no objection to it. It may be open to objection, however, in so far as the desirable or recommended degree of administrative autonomy or independence of the courts is concerned. In my opinion, the fact that certain financial benefits applicable to civil servants were also made applicable to provincial court judges, that the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) and its judges were shown in printed material as associated with the Ministry of the Attorney General and that the Executive exercised administrative control over certain discretionary benefits or advantages affecting the judges did not prevent the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction from being reasonably perceived as possessing the essential institutional independence required for purposes of s. 11(d).

VII

It is necessary now to consider the effect on the individual independence of provincial court judges of the control exercised by the Executive over certain discretionary benefits or advantages. I have referred to the provisions of the Provincial Courts Act and the Courts of Justice Act, 1984 concerning post-retirement reappointment or continuation in office, which may be necessary to permit a judge to complete entitlement to pension. Objection was also taken to the provisions for leave of absence with or without pay and for permission to engage in extra-judicial employment. The provisions for leave of absence that were applicable to provincial court judges at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction were found in ss. 4 and 5 of Regulation 811 of the Revised Regulations of révéler hautement souhaitable, elle ne saurait, à mon avis, être considérée comme essentielle pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Les aspects essentiels de l'indépendance institutionnelle qui peuvent raisonnablement être perçus comme suffisants pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) doivent, je pense, se limiter à ceux mentionnés par le juge en chef Howland. On peut les résumer comme étant le contrôle par le tribunal des décisions administratives qui portent directement et immédiatement sur l'exercice des fonctions judiciaires. Dans la mesure où la distinction entre l'indépendance dans l'administration et l'indépendance dans les décisions se veut le reflet de cette limitation, je n'y vois aucune objection. On peut s'y opposer toutefois dans la mesure où le degré souhaitable ou recommandé d'indépendance ou d'autonomie administrative des tribunaux est concerné. À mon avis, le fait que certains avantages financiers applicables aux fonctionnaires soient aussi applicables aux juges de cour provinciale, que la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) et ses juges soient, dans des brochures, associés au ministère du Procureur général, et que l'exécutif exerce un contrôle administratif sur certains bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires touchant les juges, n'empêchait pas la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle), à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, d'être raisonnablement perçue comme possédant l'indépendance institutionnelle essentielle pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*).

Il est maintenant nécessaire d'examiner l'effet qu'a, sur l'indépendance individuelle des juges de cour provinciale, le contrôle exercé par l'exécutif sur certains bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires. J'ai mentionné les dispositions de la Loi sur les cours provinciales et de la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires, concernant les nouvelles nominations ou le maintien des juges dans leur charge après l'âge de la retraite, qui peuvent se révéler nécessaires pour permettre à un juge d'être admissible à une pension. On s'est aussi opposé aux dispositions concernant les congés payés ou non payés et l'autorisation de s'adonner à des activités extrajudiciaires. Les dispositions portant sur les congés qui s'appliquaient aux juges de cour provinciale, à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné

Ontario, 1980, made under the Provincial Courts Act, and in ss. 75 and 76 of Regulation 881 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1980, made under the Public Service Act. Sections 4 and 5 of Regulation 811 provide that the Attorney General, upon the recommendation of the chief judge of the provincial courts, may grant to a judge leave of absence without pay and without the accumulation of sick leave credits for a period up to three years, and that the Lieutenant Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, may grant special leave of absence with pay to a judge for special or compassionate purposes for a period not exceeding one year. Sections 75(1) and 76(1) of Regulation 881, which were made applicable to provincial court judges by s. 7 of Regulation 811, provided that a deputy minister could grant to an employee in his ministry leave of absence with pay for a period of not more than one year for the purpose of undertaking employment under the auspices of the Government of Canada or other public agency and leave of absence without pay and without accumulation of credits for a period of not more than one year for the purpose of undertaking employment under the auspices of the Government of Canada or other public agency, or by a public or private corporation. A leave of absence granted under s. 75 or s. 76 of Regulation 881 could be renewed from year to year. By s. 32(3) of Ontario Regulation 332/84, made on May 25, 1984, the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) was given the authority, in place of the deputy minister, to grant leave of absence to provincial court judges under ss. 75 and 76 of Regulation 881. The provision concerning permission to engage in extra-judicial employment at the time Sharpe J. declined jurisdiction was s. 12 of the Provincial Courts Act, which read as follows:

12.—(1) Subject to subsection (2), unless authorized by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, a judge shall not practise or actively engage in any business, trade or occupation but shall devote his whole time to the performance of his duties as a judge.

compétence, se retrouvent aux art. 4 et 5 du règlement 811 des Règlements refondus de l'Ontario de 1980, pris en application de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, et aux art. 75 et 76 du règlement 881 des Règlements refondus de l'Ontario de 1980, pris en application de la Loi sur la fonction publique. Les articles 4 et 5 du règlement 811 prévoient que le procureur général, sur la recommandation du juge en chef des cours provinciales, peut accorder à un juge un congé, non payé et sans crédit de congés de maladie, pour une période pouvant aller jusqu'à trois ans, et que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil, sur la recommandation du procureur général, peut accorder un congé payé spécial à un juge, pour des raisons humanitaires ou spéciales, pour une durée maximale d'un an. Les paragraphes 75(1) et 76(1) du règlement 881, rendus applicables aux juges de cour provinciale par l'art. 7 du règlement 811, prévoient qu'un sous-ministre peut accorder à un employé de son ministère un congé payé d'une durée maximale d'un an, pour lui permettre de travailler sous les auspices du gouvernement du Canada ou d'un autre organisme public, et un congé, non payé et sans crédit de congés de maladie, d'une durée maximale d'un an, pour lui permettre de travailler sous les auspices du gouvernement du Canada ou d'un autre organisme public ou d'une société publique ou privée. Un congé accordé en vertu des art. 75 ou 76 du règlement 881 peut être renouvelé d'année en année. Selon le par. 32(3) du Règlement de l'Ontario 332/84, pris le 25 mai 1984, le juge en chef de la Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) a reçu le pouvoir, en lieu et place du sous-ministre, d'accorder un congé aux juges de cour provinciale en vertu des art. 75 et 76 du règlement 881. La disposition concernant l'autorisation de s'adonner à une activité extrajudiciaire, à l'époque où le juge Sharpe a décliné compétence, était l'art. 12 de la Loi sur les cours provinciales, dont voici le texte:

(2) A judge, with the previous consent of the Minister, may act as arbitrator, conciliator or member of a police commission.

The provision with respect to extra-judicial employment of provincial judges in the Courts of Justice Act, 1984 is s. 53, which came into force on January 1, 1985 and reads as follows:

53.—(1) A provincial judge shall devote his or her whole time to the performance of his or her duties as a judge, except as authorized by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), a provincial judge who, before the coming into force of this Part, had the consent of the Attorney General to act as an arbitrator or conciliator may continue to so act.

There are similar provisions respecting extra-judicial employment in the provincial courts legislation of the other provinces. In some cases it is specified that a judge shall not receive any additional remuneration for such employment.

While it may well be desirable that such discretionary benefits of advantages, to the extent that they should exist at all, should be under the control of the judiciary rather than the Executive, as recommended by the Deschênes report and others, I do not think that their control by the Executive touches what must be considered to be one of the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. In so far as the subjective aspect is concerned, I agree with the Court of Appeal that it would not be reasonable to apprehend that a provincial court judge would be influenced by the possible desire for one of these benefits or advantages to be less than independent in his or her adjudication.

For the foregoing reasons I am of the opinion that at the time he declined jurisdiction on December 16, 1982 Sharpe J. sitting as the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) was an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Charter. The same is true in my opinion of all the judges of the Court since the amendment in 1983 to s. 5(4) of the Provincial Courts Act removed the objection to the nature of the tenure under a post-retirement appointment or continuation in office. Accordingly I would dismiss the appeal and

La disposition concernant les emplois extrajudiciaires des juges provinciaux dans la Loi de 1984 sur les tribunaux judiciaires est l'art. 53, entré en vigueur le 1er janvier 1985, dont voici le texte:

53.—(1) Le juge d'une cour provinciale se consacre à ses fonctions à l'exclusion de toutes autres, sauf avec l'autorisation du lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil.

(2) Par dérogation au par. (1), le juge qui, avant l'entrée en vigueur de la présente partie, avait l'autorisation du procureur général pour agir à titre d'arbitre ou de conciliateur peut continuer d'occuper ces fonctions.

Il y a des dispositions semblables concernant les activités extrajudiciaires dans la législation des autres provinces sur les cours provinciales. Dans certains cas, il est spécifié qu'un juge ne touchera aucune rémunération additionnelle pour une telle activité.

S'il peut être souhaitable que ces bénéfices ou avantages discrétionnaires, dans la mesure où il devrait y en avoir, soient contrôlés par le pouvoir judiciaire plutôt que par l'exécutif, comme le rapport Deschênes et d'autres l'on recommandé, je ne pense pas que leur contrôle par l'exécutif touche à ce qui doit être considéré comme l'une des conditions essentielles de l'indépendance judiciaire pour les fins de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Pour ce qui est de l'aspect subjectif, je conviens avec la Cour d'appel qu'il ne serait pas raisonnable de craindre qu'un juge de cour provinciale, influencé par l'éventuelle volonté d'obtenir l'un de ces bénéfices ou avantages, soit loin d'être indépendant au moment de rendre jugement.

Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je suis d'avis qu'à l'époque où il a décliné compétence, soit le 16 décembre 1982, le juge Sharpe siégeant en Cour provinciale (Division criminelle) constituait un tribunal indépendant au sens de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. On peut dire la même chose, selon moi, de tous les juges de la cour puisque la modification apportée en 1983 au par. 5(4) de la Loi sur les cours provinciales a fait disparaître l'objection à la nature de la charge par suite d'une nomination après l'âge de la retraite ou du maintien en poste.

THE RISE OF SELF-REPRESENTATION IN CANADA'S FAMILY COURTS: THE COMPLEX PICTURE REVEALED IN SURVEYS OF JUDGES, LAWYERS AND LITIGANTS

Rachel Birnbaum,* Nicholas Bala and Lorne Bertrand

This article reports on four interrelated studies on self-representation by family litigants: a study of family litigants in Ontario; a survey of perceptions of lawyers in Ontario and Alberta; and a study of Canadian judges. There has clearly been an increase in self-representation in family cases. Lack of financial resources is the most significant reason for self-representation, but a significant number of the self-represented do not believe that they will have worse outcomes without a lawyer. Lawyers and judges report significant concerns about lack of representation, including fewer settlements and a slower process, with corresponding increased expenses for a represented party.

L'article fait le compte-rendu de quatre études connexes portant sur des parties à un litige de droit familial qui se représentent elles-mêmes. Il analyse ainsi une étude sur des parties à un litige de droit familial en Ontario, un sondage sur les perceptions des avocats de l'Ontario et de l'Alberta et une étude sur les juges canadiens. Il ressort de ces analyses, une nette augmentation des parties qui se représentent elles-mêmes dans les affaires de nature familiale. Le manque de ressources financières est la raison la plus souvent invoquée par les parties dans leurs décisions de se représenter eux-mêmes. En revanche, un nombre significatif de personnes non représentées ne croient pas que l'issue des

Pour leur part, les avocats et les juges manifestent d'importantes préoccupations relativement au manque de représentation, notamment la diminution de règlements à l'amiable et un processus judiciaire plus lent. Tout ceci entraîne comme conséquence des coûts plus élevés pour les parties représentées par un avocat.

1. The Context of Rising Family Self-Representation

Lack of access to family justice and self-representation in family proceedings are growing concerns in many countries, including Canada. There has been much discussion among lawyers, judges, researchers and policy makers about the causes for an increasing number of family litigants who do not have lawyers and the effects of this lack of legal representation particularly in family court, but there has been little empirical research about these questions. Research studies about these problems in a number of countries have focused on the impacts of legal aid cutbacks,[1] the growing number of services to assist the self-represented,[2] the challenges very little empirical research from anywhere that has reported on the perspectives of family litigants about the reasons for and effects of lack representation.[7]

This article reports on the results from a research project involving four interrelated Canadian studies on self-representation in the family justice process[8] and on services intended to address their problems. The groups surveyed were:

(1) family law lawyers in Ontario and Alberta;
(2) Canadian judges; and
(3) litigants in Ontario's family justice system, both with and without lawyers.

Part 2 explains the methodologies of the different studies; the balance of the article discusses the results of this research, comparing perceptions and experiences of the different groups surveyed. Part 3 examines perceptions

8 This paper uses the term "self-represented litigant" to refer to a person who does not have a lawyer, for whatever reason or reasons. Some authors and agencies, including Ontario's Law Society, make a distinction between "self-represented litigants" and "unrepresented litigants." The position of the Law Society of Upper Canada, for example, is that:

> It is important to distinguish between an unrepresented party and a self-represented party. An unrepresented party is often acting on his or her own behalf because they have no choice-the party does not qualify for Legal Aid and cannot afford a lawyer. Even if the party did have a lawyer at one time, they find that they are now representing themselves as they no longer have the funds to continue paying for representation.
> Self -represented parties represent themselves because they want to – they have an agenda that they wish to follow and believe that they are able to represent themselves. Although this [L.S.U.C.] paper generally refers to self-represented parties, some of the remarks are equally applicable to unrepresented parties.

Law Society of Upper Canada, "How to Avoid the Complaint – Dealing with Unrepresented and Self-represented Parties in Family Law," online: (2008) <http://rc.lsuc.on.ca/pdf/kt/avoidComplaintFamily.pdf>.

As discussed in this article, this distinction, while helpful for some analytical purposes, is in practice often impossible to make, and accordingly we follow the more common practice, and use the term "self-represented" for those without a lawyer for any reason. In this text we do make some distinctions based on the reason that a person is self-represented, but we do not employ different terms for these situations.

of professionals about changes in the extent of self-representation over time, and the reports of all respondent groups about the reasons for self-representation, including the extent to which respondents believe that not having a lawyer will affect the family justice process. Part 4 considers perceptions of the treatment of self-represented litigants in the family justice system. Part 5 explores the perceived effects on outcomes of being self-represented. Part 6 concludes with a discussion of implications of this research for Canadian policy and practice, identifying issues to be addressed by the judiciary, governments, bar associations and individual practitioners, as well providing some suggestions for future research.

Our research indicates there has been a significant increase in the number of self-represented family litigants over the past few years as reported by the different groups surveyed; suggesting that over half of the family cases in Canada's courts now have one or both parties without a lawyer; this is consistent with the limited government data available, which also reports an increase in self-representation in family cases. An inability to afford a lawyer is a major factor in the lack of representation, but litigants' motivations for not having a lawyer are often complex, including the rise of "do it yourself" social attitudes and a perception of some self-represented litigants that having a lawyer will not result in a significantly better outcome. Governments and others have responded to the lack of representation by increasing information and services for these litigants, which is in turn resulting in an increase in self-representation. It seems that a "tipping point" has been reached. It seems inevitable that there will continue to be large and perhaps even growing numbers of self-represented family litigants, especially among lower and middle income litigants. While some of those without lawyers achieve reasonably fair outcomes, the continuing high rates of self-representation will pose significant challenges for the justice system, and will result in frustration and concerns for litigants, both those with and without lawyers. These developments raise concerns about "two-tier" justice, with those who are wealthier tending to resolve disputes with lawyers outside the court system, and those with more limited means tending to resolve family disputes in a stressed family justice system, often without adequate legal advice or assistance.

2. Methodology of Our Research Project

While a number of research studies have been undertaken on issues related to self-representation in the family justice system,[9] this is one of the very 11 These three surveys on access to justice and self-representation involved many collaborators to whom the authors are grateful.

For the survey of Ontario lawyers, we express thanks to Shari Slonim, Continuing Professional Development, Law Society of Upper Canada.

The survey of Ontario family litigants was conducted by law students recruited by Pro Bono Students Canada at Osgoode Hall Law School, Queen's University, the University of Toronto, Western University, Ontario and the University of Windsor. We are grateful to Nikki Gershbain, National Director, Pro Bono Students Canada (PBSC), and the PBSC Program Managers, Navneet Johal and Krystyna Drywa. Emily Hubling, program coordinator at the University of Toronto Law School was instrumental in facilitating the process with the other schools. We are also most grateful to Melissa MacRae, third year law student at Queen's University, and her supervisor Leanne Wight, Senior Duty Counsel, Kingston Family Court, for their work on helping to develop and pilot test the survey instrument.

We are also most grateful to Mr Justice Jim Williams, Supreme Court of Nova Scotia (Family Division) and Mary Ahearn from the National Judicial Institute for their support for the judges' survey. Thanks also to Marie Gordon of Gordon Zwaenepoel, for her assistance with the survey of Alberta lawyers.

Last, but certainly not least, we wish to thank all the participants who gave their time to complete our surveys and share their experiences and opinions about the family education program in Canada, held in Toronto each year. There were 335 lawyer respondents, a response rate of about 42% of the program attendees. The Alberta survey was sent to 174 lawyers who were believed to practice family law; there were 71 respondents, a response rate of 41%.[12]

The study of Canadian judges was a web-based survey of judges attending national family law judicial education programs held in Toronto (February 2012) and Halifax (July 2012). This survey was completed by 54 judges: a response rate of just under 50% of program attendees; the judges were from all regions in Canada and were almost all trial judges.[13] The response rates were high for a survey administered to professional groups, reflecting the interest and concern of these professionals about this issue.

The study of Ontario family law litigants, both self-represented and represented, was undertaken from October 2011 to March 2012, with volunteer law students approaching litigants at six court sites in four Ontario cities, and asking them to participate in the study.[14] The survey justice system; we hope that they find some satisfaction in knowing that their perspectives are being shared widely with a broad readership of family justice professionals, policy makers and scholars.

[12] The list was compiled by the Canadian Research Institute for Law and the Family.

[13] Some demographic information was collected about judges, but to preserve anonymity, none of the judicial responses are reported by gender or jurisdiction.

[14] The survey of family litigants was initially piloted in Kingston, Ontario to determine the flow of the questions and the length of time the survey took that led to minor revisions. The authors sent an email to all the local administrative judges in the courts that were being surveyed to advise them that the study was taking place in their courthouse. The authors also advised the Ministry of Attorney General and both Chief Justices of the Ontario Court and Superior Court that the study was being conducted in the courthouses with the assistance of Pro Bono Students Canada. The self-represented and represented litigants were surveyed in the: Superior Court of Justice in Toronto; two Ontario Court of Justice courts in Toronto; Superior Court of Justice (Family) in Kingston; Superior Court of Justice (Family) in London; and Ontario Court of Justice in Windsor, Ontario. Thus, the survey was completed by litigants at all three family trial courts, and included litigants from the largest metropolitan area in Canada and smaller urban centres. All the Pro Bono students in Toronto, London, Kingston and Windsor were trained by Professors Birnbaum and Bala. The training addressed how to approach and interview the participants, given the stressful nature of the family court process, the inclusion/exclusion criteria for the study, and how to administer the survey. We express our sincere gratitude to these students: Dianne Verano and Jackie Strybos (University of Windsor Law School); Lina Nasir, Jessica Lipton, and Terrah Smith (Western UniversityLaw School); Jonathan Cheng, Hayley Ha, Megan Cheema, and Katherine Georgious (University of Toronto Law School); Alexandra Kocherga (Osgoode Hall Law School); and Naila Ruba, Belinda Chui, and Natasha Engineer (Queen's Law School).

consisted of a 34-item questionnaire, administered by the students. The surveys were completed by 275 litigants, about 60% without lawyers and 40% with lawyers, [15] and roughly equal numbers of men and women.

All of these studies focus on experiences in the litigation process in the family courts. This is an important limitation to all of these studies, both in terms of methodology and policy implications. As revealed in these studies, when there is a lack of representation, there is a greater difficulty in settling a case. If both parties have lawyers, there may be a greater likelihood of settlement of a case, often without court proceedings even being commenced, perhaps through a process like collaborative family law, or there may be resolution by private arbitration. The experiences of litigants and the professionals who resolve their cases outside the court system were not the focus of these studies.

3. Self-Representation – Perceptions of Incidence, Causes and Effects

Commentators in a number of countries have observed that there has been a significant increase in the number of self-represented litigants in the family courts in recent years.[16] While there is no national data on self-representation in Canada's family courts, in our surveys, the vast majority of lawyers and judges reported that over the past five years they perceived significant increases in the number of self-represented family litigants. Figure 1 illustrates the perceptions of Ontario and Alberta family lawyers and Canadian judges about the number of self-represented family litigants over the previous five years.[17]

[15] The proportion of self-represented litigants in our study appears to be slightly higher than was reported by the Ontario government, based on data collected at the time of original filing of a domestic application. Between 1998 and 2003, an average of 46% of litigants in the Ontario Family Courts were not represented by a lawyer at time of original commencement of court proceedings, rising to 62% in 2006-2007, before falling somewhat to 54% in 2009-2010, the last year for which there is data available from the Ontario Ministry of Attorney General; this is based on applications under the Family Law Act, RSO 19909, c F3, the Children's Law Reform Act, RSO 1990, c F12 and the Divorce Act , RSC 1985, c 3 (2d Supp) filed in the Ontario Court of Justice, the Family Court and the Ontario Superior Court.

[16] Rosemary Hunter et al, The Changing Face of Litigation: Unrepresented Litigants in Family Court of Australia (Sydney: Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales, 2002); Richard Zorza, "An Overview of Self Represented Litigation Innovation, its Impact, and Approach for the Future: An Invitation to Dialogue" (2009) 43 Fam LQ 519 [Zorza, "Overview"].

[17] The majority of lawyers had an average of 19 years of practice experience and the judges had an average of 9 years of experience as a judge.

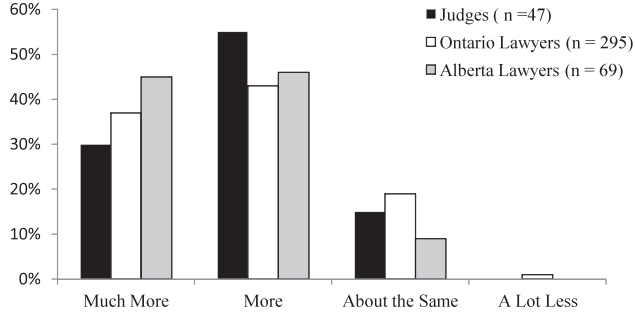
Change in the number of self-represented over past 5 years?



In their survey, judges reported that in an average of 35% (range 10%-75%) of their family cases, only 1 party had a lawyer, and in an average of 24% (range 2%-70%) of their family cases neither party had a lawyer. In the survey of Ontario lawyers, respondents reported that an average of 22% of their family cases over the previous year had no lawyer at all on the other side. Another 26% of the cases had no lawyer on the other side for part of the case. Only 4% of the Ontario lawyers reported no experience in the past year with family cases without a lawyer for the other party. The lawyers' survey does not reflect cases where neither party had a lawyer at any point in the process. In Alberta, the lawyers reported that 13% of their family law cases did not have a lawyer on the other side for the entire case and 19% reported that they had a self-represented litigant on the other side for part of the case.

Taken together, the results of the surveys of judges and lawyers clearly suggest that there has been a significant increase in the amount of self-representation over the past five years, and in over half of the cases in the family court system, one or both of the parties do not have a lawyer for all of the proceeding.

It is often difficult to determine the reason why an individual does not have a lawyer. The most obvious way is simply to ask self-represented individuals why they do not have a lawyer, but, assuming that they are being candid, they may not have carefully reflected on their own decision-making, or there may be a complex combination of reasons that may change over time. Further, some respondents may have a "pro-social" bias in their responses. For example, it may seem more acceptable to report to an interviewer that one cannot afford a lawyer than to say that one looks forward to humiliating a former partner through in-person cross-examination. Recognizing the complexity of determining motivations, we asked each respondent group about the reasons for self-representation. While there was significant convergence in responses, there was also some interesting variation.

As the discussion below indicates, financial reasons and ineligibility for legal aid are the most significant explanatory factors for lack of representation. For many middle income individuals, however, the decision not to retain a lawyer is often at least in part based on their assessment that, given their income and asset level, the value of having a lawyer would not justify the cost. In other words, they have absolute ability to pay, but given the costs of legal services and their perceptions of its limited value for them, they have chosen to spend their money on other priorities.[18] For some family litigants, the decision to self-represent reflects a confidence in their own knowledge and ability to navigate the system, a distrust of lawyers or a desire to deal directly with their former partner.

Figure 2 shows that all respondent groups rated lack of finances and ineligibility for legal aid as the primary reason for family litigants being self-represented. However, interestingly, while judges and lawyers generally share similar views about the overwhelming importance of financial reasons, the self-represented litigants actually rated lack of financial resources as a less significant factor and provided a more comprehensive picture of why they did not have lawyers.

Less than half of those (45%) without representation reported that their primary reason for not having a lawyer was that they did not have enough money and did not have legal aid. A number (8%) were waiting to see if the other party would have a lawyer, suggesting that lack of representation sometimes feeds on itself. Another 8% expressed a concern that having a lawyer would increase the delay, cost or conflict involved. There were 5% who gave as their primary reason for not having a lawyer the desire to deal directly with a former partner; these are individuals who are likely to have higher conflict proceedings, as they seek to continue to engage with, or even confront their former partner.

While it is clear that financial concerns are a major issue for lack of representation, some of the comments from judges about the reasons for [18] The Australian Law Reform Commission, Review of the Federal Civil Justice System Discussion Paper 62 (Sydney: Australian Law Reform Commission, 1999), did not find empirical evidence to connect the support in cuts to legal aid funding and an increase in the number of self-represented in the civil courts. However, Dewar, supra note 13, found that there was an identifiable link between the unavailability of legal aid and self-representation in the Family Courts.

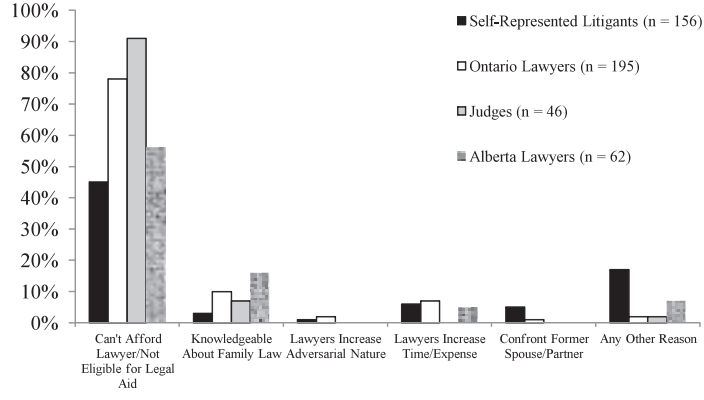
Why Family Law Litigants are Self-Represented: A Comparison of Reasons (Reasons Ranked #1)



self-representation suggest that the decision of family litigants not to have a lawyer is influenced by many factors:

> "Mental health issues; some have been through 2 or 3 incompetent lawyers; some know it's costing the other side and their time is free."
> "Some are obsessed with conflict."
> "They are unwilling to listen to the advice they receive from counsel."
> "There has been a cultural change where people want to participate directly in matters affecting them, where they are not afraid to speak up, where they believe they have the right to do so in a transparent arena that will treat them fairly and quickly."

While there was a range of reasons for being self-represented, litigants who had lawyers were almost all satisfied with their decision to have representation. The vast majority of litigants with lawyers stated that they planned to continue with their lawyer, and reported that their lawyer was very helpful (62%) or moderately helpful (19%); only 2% said their lawyer was not helpful. Most of those with lawyers (73%) expected that they would obtain a better outcome as a result of having a lawyer, and more than a third expected that the process would take less time having a lawyer. The most common primary reason for having a lawyer (41%) was the expectation of a "better outcome," while 26% of litigants with lawyers gave lack of knowledge of the legal process as their primary reason for representation, and 5% reported not wanting to directly deal with the other party as their primary reason.

As illustrated in Figure 3, among the respondents to the litigant survey, lack of representation was clearly associated with financial circumstance.

For both men and women, those with higher incomes were significantly more likely to have a lawyer than those in lower income groups.[19]

Figure 3 also shows that some litigants in higher income groups do not have a lawyer, although there was no statistical significance between genders. While there were significant differences between those that are 30 years of age or less and those that are over 30 years of age, with significantly more individuals 30 years of age and older likely to have a lawyer as compared to younger litigants,[20] there were no statistically significant gender or age differences once the generally higher incomes of older litigants is taken into account.

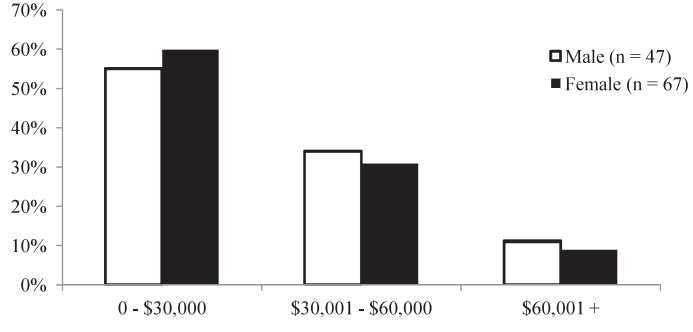
% of Self-Represented Litigants by Gender and Income



While a narrow majority of lawyers and judges did not report observing systemic differences between the reasons that men and women are self-represented, a substantial minority of justice system professionals believe that there are gender differences in the reasons for lack of representation. A common perception of these professional groups is that women are more likely to be self-represented due to an inability to afford a lawyer, while men may be more likely to be self-represented due to a desire to deal directly with their former partner or because of confidence in their ability to represent themselves. Comments from lawyers and judges included:[21]

19 Among males, those with higher incomes are significantly more likely to have a lawyer, ($x^2(2) = 24.24$, $p<.001$). A similar pattern was observed for females; females with higher incomes were significantly more likely to have a lawyer ($x^2(2) = 11.51$, $p<.01$).

20 ($x^2(1) = 4.25$, $p<.05$).

21 Qualitative narratives provide context and texture to the quantitative data that was collected from all the studies.

> "For women, it is finances; men think they do as well as a lawyer but without the expense."[lawyer]
> "Sometimes abusive men want to be able to have direct contact with their partner." [lawyer]
> "Men more often believe they don't need a lawyer. Women do not have the money." [judge]

The responses of litigants also reveal some interesting gender differences in explaining their reasons for lack of representation. While 7% of men without lawyers said that their desire to deal directly with the other party was their primary reason for being unrepresented, only 3% of unrepresented women gave this response. Almost 10% of self- represented men believed that they would experience worse outcomes for economic issues if they had a lawyer and their case is to be resolved by a judge, while only 2% of women believed that they would have a worse outcome in court with a lawyer. Only 32% of self-represented males versus 60% of represented males believe that litigants have worse outcomes for economic issues if a judge decides a case because they do not have a lawyer.[22] In other words, a majority of self- represented men do not expect a worse outcome because they do not have a lawyer, though a majority of represented men would expect a worse outcome if they do not have a lawyer. By way of contrast, among females, perceptions of the value of having a lawyer for economic issues are very similar for those with and without a lawyer, with most expecting better outcomes on economic issues resolved by a judge for those with lawyers. These responses generally suggest that men have less concern about being self-represented than women, and that men's lack of representation is more likely to be a result of the desire to directly engage with their former partner.

In both Ontario and Alberta, the vast majority of lawyers (84% and 89% respectively) report that the self-represented always or usually have unrealistically high expectations for the outcome of their cases. Ontario and Alberta lawyers (78% and 88% respectively) also report that self-represented litigants are less likely or much less likely to settle. Lawyers also express concern that self-represented litigants always or usually look for advice to the lawyer for the represented party (47% in Ontario and 68% in Alberta), though of course there are very significant ethical and professional constraints in what a lawyer for one party can or should do to assist an unrepresented party. Table 1 sets out data on the views of Ontario and Alberta lawyers on some aspects of dealing with self-represented litigants.

22 There is, of course, the possibility that some people who cannot afford lawyers are engaging in ex post rationalizing and reporting that it will not make a difference, and that men are more likely than women to engage in this type of rationalization.

Table 1: Lawyer reports on self-represented litigants
Self-represented have unrealistically high outcome expectations
	Ontario	Alberta
Always	28%	26%
Usually	56%	63%
Sometimes	15%	11%
Rarely	1%	0%
Self-represented look to lawyer or other party for advice
	Ontario	Alberta
Always	9%	17%
Usually	38%	51%
Sometimes	45%	27%
Rarely	10%	5%

Lawyers almost universally (Ontario: 91%; Alberta: 97%) report that the fact that the other side is unrepresented adds to the costs of their clients to resolve a case. Most lawyers also reported that they always (Ontario: 75%; Alberta: 86%) document communication with the self-represented more carefully than when dealing with opposing counsel, which contributes to the increased costs to their clients. It is not surprising that the lawyers reported that their clients are always or usually upset (Ontario: 76%; Alberta: 86%) about their increased costs due to the other side being self- represented. Some comments expressed from lawyers on behalf of their clients were:

> "… thousands of dollars because generally self-represented parties do not respond [to]reasonable to requests for adjournments, information, etc … self-represented want to be 'in front of the judge' which increases the costs substantially." [Ontario lawyer]
> "… at trial, it always takes about a day longer while the judge tries to extract meaningful information. Also self-reps don't follow the rules, so there is additional time expended exploring remedies for their failure to follow the rules [disclosure, giving notice, etc]." [Ontario lawyer]
> "The Court imposes on the solicitor to do what the self rep can't/won't do and the cost is borne by the represented party. Even costs, when awarded are lower than the norm. If anything, they should be higher." [Alberta lawyer]
> "Everything with a self-rep is difficult, must be in writing, and ends up costing my client. Presently I have several male self-reps on the other side who could easily afford a lawyer but have chosen to make life difficult for their spouses. No adjournment requests are agreed to, nothing by consent, everything ends up in chambers, and judges never award costs as 'he didn't know the process.' Each unnecessary appearance costs my client." [Alberta lawyer]

A majority of lawyers report that in their experience, if the other side is self-represented, settlement is less likely (Ontario: 54%; Alberta: 46%) or much less likely (Ontario: 24%; Alberta: 43%). Similarly a majority of judges reported that if one side is self-represented, settlement is less likely (54%) or much less likely (15%) than if both litigants have a lawyer. Judges also report that if one (90%) or both sides (86%) are self-represented, the length of time to resolve or manage the case significantly increases. These results indicate that professionals clearly believe that lack of representation makes settlement less likely, takes longer, and therefore; implicitly increases the costs to the represented party as well as to the publicly funded justice system.

Judges reported that they deal with a case differently if one or both sides are self-represented, than if both sides have counsel.[23] Judges' comments on this issue included:

> "I am always more cognizant of the perceived 'imbalance' that exists when only one party has a lawyer."
> "There are obligations to assist an unrepresented party without being an advocate—the judge must be very careful to explain the process and evidentiary or procedural issues to self-represented parties—the judge must be especially alert to fairness issues."

4. Perceptions of Treatment of Self-represented Litigants by the Courts Lawyers generally have somewhat different views from litigants about how well the self-represented are treated by the judges, though interestingly both represented and self-represented litigants have similar views. As illustrated in Figure 4, most lawyers (57% in Ontario and 77%

[23] The Canadian Judicial Council in 2006 adopted a Statement of Principles on self-represented litigants and accused persons. While only advisory in nature, this statement and appellate case law in Canada makes clear that judges have a duty to assist and accommodate self-represented litigants, though this must be delicately balanced with a the need to maintain impartiality and avoid "becoming an advocate" for an unrepresented party. See Joan Goldschmidt, "Judicial Assistance to Self-Represented Litigants: Lessons from the Canadian Experience" (2009) 17 Mich St J Int'l L 60; Hurley v Hurley, 2012 NSCA 32, 314 NSR (2d) 346. See also e.g. Robson v Albazi, 2012 ONCJ 194, 213 ACWS (3d) 410, where Spence J of the Ontario Court of Justice had a trial with two self-represented litigants and stated at para 3, "Both parties were self-represented in this proceeding. Both gave evidence at trial and each had the opportunity to cross-examine the other. Because of the parties' unfamiliarity with court procedures, I assisted both of them by explaining how to give their evidence, as well as asking questions of each of them in an effort to tease out the evidence which I believed would be of assistance to me in making an informed decision".

in Alberta) believe that self-represented litigants are treated "very well" by the judiciary, while only 14% of the self-represented and 9% of the represented litigants believe that the self-represented are very well treated. On the other hand, only a relatively small percent of each group feel that self-represented are "not well treated at all" by judges.[24]

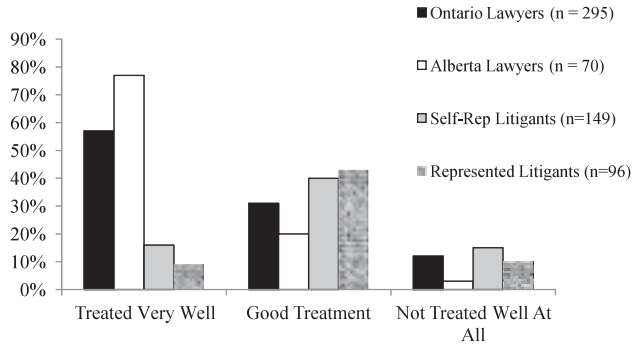
Do Self-Represented Litigants Get Fair Treatment From Judiciary?



Many lawyers (Ontario: 47%; Alberta: 47%) reported that their clients usually get upset about the judge appearing to favor the self-represented in court.

Some of the comments from those who were self-represented litigants and who expressed concerns about treatment by judges as a result of not having a lawyer included:

> "Judges can be very disrespectful to litigants who do not have lawyers. For example, they raise their voice and use rude names. I was so surprised that a Judge was allowed to call me a name." [male]
> "I hope they [judges] do [treat us fairly] but I don't know. … they [judges] treat them [self-represented] differently cause don't all lawyers know each other and the judges?" [male]
> "It seems to depend on the judge. Some judges are friends with some lawyers, and if they are friends with that lawyer, they'll be gentler with their client." [male]
> "It's about the judge's character, not about you. That's what I learned early on, to not take things personally cause otherwise you will go crazy." [female]

[24] Figure 4 does not include data on "don't knows." Understandably, questions about how self-represented litigants are treated by the courts were answered by almost all lawyers, but there were high rates of "don't know" by litigants, especially those with lawyers.

Some comments from represented litigants reflected similar perceptions about the treatment of the self-represented by judges, which may have influenced their decisions to seek representation:

> "… probably not treated too well. My friend was in court before and she didn't have [a] lawyer and she's the one who told me to get one, so maybe she felt disadvantaged." [female]
> "Previous experiences as self-rep, judge did not listen to me." [female]

In fairness to the judiciary, it is not possible to assess the validity of these reported concerns and perceptions of litigants about their treatment by judges. While some judges might be impatient or even rude with self-represented litigants, it is notable that in our survey, lawyers, who are regularly in court and knowledgeable observers, report that judges generally treat self-represented litigants with patience and courtesy. Some self-represented litigants, however, are very difficult for judges or opposing counsel to deal with and may require firm direction about appropriate conduct in court; others may be overwhelmed and misunderstand what has happened or report accurately on how they have been treated.

A majority of self-represented litigants, almost an even number of male and female self-represented litigants, reported that navigating the court system was difficult or very difficult (67%: gender combined); many of them believed that the lack of a lawyer made the process slower or much slower (49%: gender combined), though a significant portion (31%: gender combined) reported that they felt that lack of representation did not slow down resolution. Many believed that lawyers usually made problems for the self-represented in court worse than they need to be (53%: gender combined). Some of the negative comments of self-represented litigants about lawyers included:

> "Lawyers add fuel to the flame. I wish there was more mediation." [female]
> "Number of lawyers who are simply 'cash for kids'; objectives are not in the best interests of family, it's about the cash that they can make through litigation …"[male]

These comments should not be taken as necessarily accurate reports about the conduct of lawyers. While some lawyers may exacerbate conflict and not seek to effectively resolve cases, there are real ethical constraints on how they can deal with or negotiate with self-represented parties; it is notable that judges in our survey report that the absence of legal representation actually hinders settlement. Further, self-represented family litigants make a large number of complaints about the lawyers for their former spouses that are rejected by law societies as unfounded in a disproportionately large number of cases.[25]

From the perspective of the represented litigant, a majority report that they expect (72%: gender combined) a much better outcome as a result of having a lawyer, and many expect that the court process takes less time with a lawyer (35%: gender combined) than if they had been unrepresented. Comments from the represented litigants about the court process and the value of having a lawyer included:

> "There is a lot of information available for people to learn about the court system but reading all of that information is just too much. I might as well go to law school to learn all of these things. I am happy that I decided to get a lawyer." [female]
> "Custody of my children is an important matter and I would not trust myself if I had to be self-represented. My lawyer handles things for me and explains the system to me which is definitely easier." [female]

A recurring theme in the comments of male litigants, both those with lawyers and self-represented is a perception that the family court system is biased against men, reflected in statements such as:

> "You need a lawyer to have any chance of getting a favorable decision. This applies especially if you are male since family court judge favors women. Having a lawyer forces the judge to be more fair to the male party."
> "Courts have a bias in favor of the mother/woman. Having to come to court and pay a lawyer thousands of dollars just to get access to a child when there is no claim of abuse or other issues is wrong …"
> "Court system is biased against men—it is harder 'we have to do all the running around' Kids tend to go to the mother, not the father—because we leave the family home to maintain stability for the kids and then have to go to court to fight for the right to see them."

Women, on the other hand, tended to raise financial and safety concerns for themselves and their children, as well as concerns about lack of access to justice. Comments made by women included:

> "… the court entertains whatever my husband brings up to the court as entertainable claims which cause a huge amount of expense. To deal with my 2010 income I had to provide photocopies of accounts for the past 5 years and this was over 500 pages of photocopying and this is very expensive …"

> "I can't get legal aid because I make too much money, even though I am the victim. Whereas my husband, as the aggressor, is going to get legal aid, because he's unemployed … difference between physical and mental ailments, I'm not being looked after. My concerns are not being heard."

4. Ontario Court Services

In 2011 Ontario followed the lead of several other jurisdictions[26] to establish a number of services to assist and better inform family litigants, especially those who are without lawyers, about the court process. One program is the Mandatory Information Program (MIP), which all family litigants, whether represented or not, must attend. A two-hour presentation is given by a lawyer and a social worker, providing basic information about the legal process and different methods of dispute resolution, with some emphasis on the value of settlement and non-adversarial dispute resolution, as well as some information about the emotional effects of separation on children. In addition, the Ministry of the Attorney General has established Family Law Information Centres (FLIC)[27] at the courts with brochures, forms and other materials about the family justice process. There are scheduled times when litigants can seek summary advice from Advice Counsel at the FLICs; these are lawyers paid by Ontario Legal Aid who will provide summary legal advice to individuals who meet financial eligibility criteria. There are also Duty Counsel lawyers paid by Legal Aid who can provide summary assistance for unrepresented litigants on the day of a court appearance. The Ministry also has a website with family law information and court forms. Of the 31% of family litigants who attended the two hour MIP session, 42% reported that it was very helpful or somewhat helpful for learning about the family justice process. Another 47% believed the sessions were very helpful or somewhat helpful about learning more about alternatives other than court, and 29% reported that the session was very helpful or somewhat helpful about learning the effects of separation on children.

26 For a review of programs in Alberta, see Joanne J Paetsch et al, High Conflict Intervention Programs in Alberta: A Review and Recommendations (Alberta: Canadian Research Institute for Law and the Family, Alberta Justice, 2007). Some provinces offer a six-hour course (British Columbia, the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, and the Family Division of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia) and most, if not all provinces and territories, now offer mandatory two-hour sessions for separating and divorcing parents prior to receiving a court order.

27 In addition, the Law Society of Upper Canada, Ontario has recently launched a website, <http://yourontariolaw.com>, that provides parents with free information and access to resources on the emotional, financial, legal and social considerations relating to child custody, access and child support.

All respondents were also asked if they used the Ministry of Attorney General (MAG) website. Less than half (37%) reported that they had used the website; of those who had, 21% reported that it was very helpful and another 47% reported that it was somewhat helpful. Respondents were also asked about the brochures and materials at the FLICs at court houses. Of the 40% who reported that they used these materials, 18% reported that they were very helpful, 46% reported somewhat helpful, and 23% reported they were moderately helpful.

While the responses to the surveys indicate that there is considerable value to these services, clearly there are limitations. Many family litigants do not have the education and literacy skills[28] to benefit from these materials, and some have visual impairments or other disabilities making them inaccessible, as reflected in some comments in the survey of litigants:

> "… There are many people with disabilities and people cannot understand. I have a reading disability and it is hard for me to understand all the issues. If you don't understand you can get denied legal aid and lose your kids. People do not have time to sit all day and wait to talk to someone, since so many people have jobs. It is a lot of money to come to downtown to court …" [female]
> "Things in the information materials need to be much clearer. The forms are too complicated and should be simplified for people who don't have lawyers." [female]
> "The information provided is practically in another language. You can't understand it. It's in court legalese, and nobody understands it. They can't break it down in laymen's terms and a hell of a lot of these people are not upper class. They probably don't understand 85% of what is written down and handed to them …" [female]

Perhaps understandably, those litigants who actually spoke to a lawyer about their family law issues, even relatively briefly, were generally more positive about this source of assistance than those who only received information from the internet or by print materials, as there was greater

[28] Brownstone J of the Ontario Court of Justice stated: "If I point out a paragraph in an affidavit that I think is important and I ask for a response and they are silent, or say they've left their reading glasses at home, that is a clue that they can't read it. Then, I read the paragraph out loud myself. I try to make sure that the party who is having difficulty understanding is made aware of the evidence so they can respond;" see Valarie Mutton, "Frozen Moment of Judicial Passion," online: (2011) 31:26 Lawyers Weekly <www.lawyersweekly.ca>. Mutton goes on to add, "The growing number of self-represented litigants in family court is alarming. But even more alarming is the fact that a significant percentage of self-represented people lack the basic literacy skills to properly understand their proceedings. Canada-wide, 15 per cent of adults have serious problems dealing with any written materials and a further 27 per cent struggle with anything beyond simple reading tasks. That's a staggering 42 per cent of the adult population who have literacy issues – and this statistic plays out in potentially tragic ways each day in our courts."

opportunity for specific information and interaction. Of the 31% of respondents who had the opportunity to speak to Advice Counsel at a FLIC, 40% reported that it was very helpful and another 35% found it somewhat helpful; only 10% reported that it was not helpful at all. There was, however, a degree of frustration with the summary nature of the assistance that could be provided. As one respondent commented:

> "They told me they shouldn't be speaking to me and that I should get a lawyer. … The exact quote was, 'Your case is too complex. You need to hire a lawyer, I cannot help you.'"
> "Depends on who you get. Some are helpful and some you can tell are just doing their job, give you the basics and then move to the next person."
> "They don't get detailed, but they give you some information."

Of the 34% of respondents who consulted with Duty Counsel on the day of a Family Court appearance, 39% reported that it was very helpful and another 34% found it somewhat helpful; only 10% reported that it was not helpful at all.

5. Expected Effects of Self-Representation on Outcomes

A) Economic and Child-Related Issues

As regards custody and access arrangements for children, lawyers tend to believe that self-represented litigants have worse outcomes than those who have lawyers, whether a case is settled by negotiation (Ontario 57%; Alberta 37%) or resolved by a judge in court proceedings (Ontario 57%; Alberta 42%). Judges were also concerned about the effect of lack of representation on child-related outcomes, with 46% believing that self-represented litigants generally have worse outcomes with respect to children. Some of the judges' comments reflect concerns about lack of representation on arrangements for children:

> "Even if they reach agreement it is often based on what they consider to be 'fair' as opposed to a child's best interests."
> "Generally worse because all possible scenarios are generally not explored."
> "Unrepresented litigants have far more chance of a less favourable outcome, because they are unable to articulate their case."
> "They [unrepresented] fail to address those issues that are probative. Their evidence/submissions are often overwhelmed by their emotions."

As regards the economic issues of property and support, judges expressed greater concern about the effect of lack of representation, with 65% reporting that self-represented litigants generally have worse outcomes as a result of lack of representation.

Family litigants were also asked whether they believed that having a lawyer would make a difference with respect to outcomes for child related and financial matters, taking account of whether they settle their case or it is decided by a judge. Figure 5 presents results for the effect that litigants expect from a lack of representation on arrangements for the care of children, if a case is decided by a judge (as opposed to settled by negotiation).

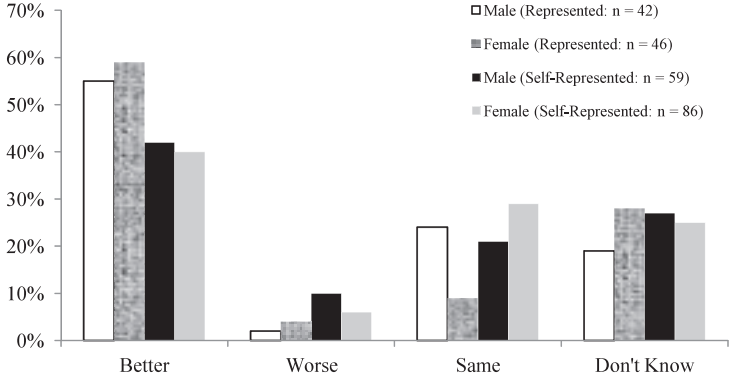
When it comes to plans for your children, do you think that having a lawyer gives you a better, worse, or the same outcome if judge makes decision?



The general expectation of litigants is that they will have better outcomes with lawyers. Those with lawyers, however, generally have a greater belief than the self-represented that representation will result in a better outcome. Represented men (54%) were more likely than self-represented men (41%) to believe that having a lawyer would result in a better outcome, and similarly represented women (57%) were more likely than self-represented women (40%) to believe that they would have a better outcome with a lawyer if a judge makes a decision about their children. Interestingly, almost 10% of self-represented men believed that for cases resolved by a judge, they would experience worse outcomes if they had a lawyer. These results suggest that a significant portion of those without lawyers do not expect it to have an effect on the outcome of their case, and some even expect to have a better outcome without a lawyer.

Figure 6 shows that only 32% of self-represented males versus 60% of represented males believe that if a judge decides a case litigants without lawyers have worse outcomes. In other words, a majority of unrepresented men do not expect a worse outcome because they do not have a lawyer, but a majority of represented men expect that they would have a worse outcome if they did not have a lawyer. By way of contrast, among women, perceptions of the value of having a lawyer for economic issues resolved by a judge are very similar for litigants with and without a lawyer, with most women expecting better outcomes on economic issues resolved by a judge for those with lawyers.

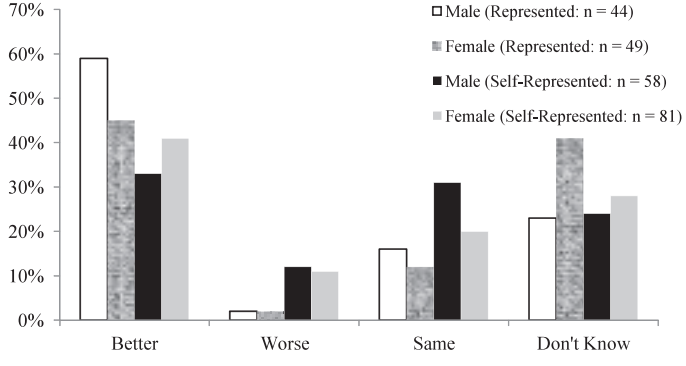
When it comes to money and property issues do you think that having a lawyer gives you a better, worse, or the same outcome if the judge makes the decision?



B) Domestic Violence Issues

Both Ontario and Alberta lawyers were asked if they thought the self-represented who are victims of domestic violence get adequate protection. A majority of Ontario lawyers (Ontario: 56%) and a little less than half of the Alberta lawyers (41%) believe that self-represented litigants who are victims of domestic violence (usually women) do not get adequate protection if their case is settled. However, a majority of Ontario and Alberta lawyers (71%; 91%, respectively) believe that self-represented litigants who are victims get adequate protection if the case is resolved by a judge. Lawyers have concerns about self-represented victims of violence being coerced in negotiations into accepting settlements that may not adequately protect them, but seem to have more confidence that judges who learn of the domestic violence will take adequate steps to protect victims.

However, judges clearly have concerns about the effect of lack of representation on cases that they decide where there is domestic violence, as reflected in the following comments:

> "There is always the fear that this category of self rep is not truly or accurately articulating their position because of fear or intimidation."
> "Domestic violence and the definition of a victim (subjective and objective) of violence is a very, very complicated dynamic. Some 'victims' will suffer a disadvantage because they accommodate and avoid conflict. Others may achieve better outcomes because they are empowered by the 'victim' perspective. Some 'victims' may choose a lawyer who further victimizes him or her, with a terrible outcome. Those who see themselves as victims—but who objectively are not—may instruct counsel to act aggressively towards the other party, and may overreach …"

The litigants were all asked if domestic violence concerns were a part of their case. 26% of males and 31% of females who were self-represented reported that domestic violence was part of the dispute, while 18% of men and 27% of females with lawyers reported that domestic violence was an issue. Although this study did not deal with "matched pairs" of litigants, the somewhat higher rates of reporting that domestic violence is an issue by women may reflect differences in the perception of this issue, with women more likely to see this as a concern.[29]

All respondents were also asked their views about the effect of lack of representation on both victims of domestic violence and those accused of domestic violence in family court. As might be expected, many respondents answered that they were unable to express an opinion on the question of whether self-represented litigants get fair treatment on domestic violence issues in the family courts. Of males who were self-represented, 35% reported that they disagreed or strongly disagreed with the statement that self-represented litigants accused of domestic violence get fair treatment in the family courts. Of females who were self-represented, 11% reported that they strongly agreed with the statement that self-represented litigants who are victims of domestic violence do not get adequate protection from the family justice system.

Interestingly, while litigants with lawyers generally expected better outcomes as regards children and financial matters because they had lawyers, they generally expected that legal representation made less difference in regard to domestic violence issues; for example 23% of the women with lawyers had expressed concern about the lack of representation of protection for victims of family violence, compared to [29] The question did not differentiate different types of domestic violence (i.e., verbal, emotional, sexual, physical, financial). In future studies this may be an important differentiation as litigants may not be aware of the differences or even wish to discuss them. It should also be noted that the Information Sheet that each litigant received prior to consenting to the study clearly stated that any form of abuse that impacts children would be reported to the local child welfare authorities.

the 17% of women without representation who expressed this concern. These responses suggest concerns, especially by the self-represented, about the effect of lack of representation on the resolution of domestic violence issues in the family courts, though the general perception seems to be that lack of representation has less effect on this issue than in regard to economic or child-related issues, presumably because there is an expectation that judges will intervene more in domestic violence cases.

6. Conclusions: Adjusting the Justice System for Self-represented Litigants

This article presents results of surveys of the views and experiences of four different groups about the causes and effects of lack of representation in Canada's family justice system. It is apparent that that there has been a substantial increase in the number of self-represented family litigants over the past five years, with significant evidence that over half of the family cases in the courts now have one or both parties without a lawyer as reported by the different groups surveyed. As there is a range of causes and effects of self-representation, there needs to be a range of responses by different institutions, agencies and professionals to deal more effectively with self-representation in the family courts.

It is notable that the responses of each group surveyed reveal that each group has a somewhat different perception of the causes and consequences of self-representation, and understandably will have different views about how to address the challenges posed by self-representation. It seems likely that the number of self-represented family litigants will grow, or at least remain large, and the results of this research project reveal that they have unique perspectives and experiences; therefore, it is important that their voices and views be equally considered as legal organizations, the judiciary and government address issues related to access to justice and lack of representation.

The results of this project confirm results of earlier smaller studies in Canada as well as research from other countries[30] that have examined the causes of the increasing number of self-represented litigants: the most important reason for the lack of representation is the inability of family litigants to afford a lawyer, and the lack of eligibility for legal aid. It is also clear, however, that a significant number of litigants could manage to afford a lawyer but are deciding to be self-represented because they feel that it is not worthwhile to retain a lawyer, and some, especially some men, actually believe that they will have a better outcome without a lawyer or wish to represent themselves to have the opportunity to directly engage with their former partners.

Many of those without lawyers are being helped by an expanding range of services provided by government or otherwise available, for example on the internet, and some litigants feel reasonably comfortable dealing with the family justice process without retaining a lawyer. For example, in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench in Calgary, there is a courtroom set aside for cases where both parties are self-represented litigants, with special support staff arrangements in place. In Ontario, the Superior Court of Justice provides self-represented litigants who are taking their case to trial with a 10-page Memorandum For Trial, outlining the court's expectations of how to conduct a trial, the procedure for a introducing evidence, and general conduct during a trial. It seems that a "tipping point" has been reached. With the growing range of services available for the self-represented and changing social attitudes and knowledge, expectations of those who are going through separation or divorce have changed. There is an understanding and expectation that having a family lawyer is one option, but self-representation is also an option, especially for those who have limited means. Reforms to substantive family law in Canada, especially the introduction of guidelines for spousal and child support, and reforms to property legislation, have also tended to make the law more comprehensible and clearer, especially for those with limited incomes and assets, suggesting that there is less need for a lawyer for individuals with less wealth if economic matters are at issue. For those with a low conflict separation, adequate education and literacy skills, and relatively simple financial affairs, lack of legal representation may not present a serious problem, at least for the self-represented litigants. Given the cost of legal services and the availability of "free" or subsidized government services, for some individuals the decision not to retain counsel to resolve family matters may well be a rational economic decision (though these self-represented litigants may be imposing added costs on the justice system and government, and often on the other party).

There is, however, also a very significant portion of self-represented family litigants who are unable to afford a lawyer in cases where there are serious concerns about the effect of lack of representation on outcomes for litigants and their children. Our results indicate that for about one half of self-represented litigants, the primary reason for not having a lawyer was that they did not have enough money to pay the costs of retaining a lawyer and were not eligible for legal aid. Many of those without lawyers expect worse outcomes and less protection because they are without counsel. As one unrepresented female litigant commented:

> "Either lawyers should charge less, or there should be more legal aid. Something's gotta give, or they can't say it's really justice, right?"

As in other countries, governments and the judiciary in Canada are trying to deal with this growing problem by providing more information and through a range of "free" services. The information and brief advice provided by these services to the self-represented litigant cannot, however, replace the detailed advice, analysis and advocacy provided by a lawyer who is trained and knowledgeable in family law, particularly when children or domestic violence are matters of concern. More needs to be done for the vulnerable self-represented litigant. Legal aid schemes clearly have an important role, though they are under increasing financial strain. There also needs to be an expansion of services provided by limited scope retainers by lawyers and increased efforts to reduce the cost of legal services. Clearly there are cases in which lawyers in family cases are not making efficient use of the legal system,[31] and all family lawyers need to be aware of the importance of making use of cost effective and proportionate legal responses.

This project also reveals that there is a group of "do-it-yourselfers" who are able to afford representation but who choose to represent themselves. Some of them, especially some men, believe that they will actually have better outcomes if they represent themselves, and some may relish the prospect of personally confronting their former partners. There is also some indication that this group of litigants may prefer to have a judge resolve their cases rather than to have a settlement. While individuals have the right to represent themselves and take their disputes to court, there need to be continuing efforts by governments, judges and law societies to educate family litigants about the value of obtaining sound legal advice and settling disputes outside the court system. Further, in appropriate cases, those who choose to represent themselves and thereby impose costs on the other party, in particular due to procedural errors, delays, unnecessary prolongation of trials or rejection of reasonable settlement offers, should be ordered to pay a substantial portion of the costs imposed on the other party,[32] and should be warned by judges at settlement conferences and other occasions that they may incur cost sanctions.

[31] See e.g. Phil Epstein "Epstein This Week in Family Law" Family Law Newsletters 47 (November 2011) (WL Can) where he discusses Gogas v. Gogas, 2011 ONSC 5368, [2012] WDFL 597: "This is a ruling by Justice Healey of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice with respect to costs as a result of a motion to change. This case is a good illustration of why we continue to see more self-represented parties, why access to the courts is being limited to those who either have no money and get legal aid or have relatively unlimited bank accounts. The costs awarded on this motion to change were $75,000. It appears that there were 13 affidavits and four financial statements filed by the applicant and 10 affidavits and three financial statements filed by the respondent. The respondent's net worth was about $700,000. I am not sure of the applicant's net worth but the costs are out of all proportion to the likely means of the parties and in any event the costs only represent a fraction of what the parties must have paid in total to their respective lawyers. There is something wrong with the family law judicial system that allows the filing of 23 affidavits and seven financial statements in the same case. It demonstrates a complete lack of adequate lawyer management and case management and judicial intervention in an attempt to find a resolution. If everyone is permitted to file 23 affidavits in each case and then expect that judges will spend time reviewing them all, then the family law justice system is truly doomed. I find this case very depressing. It says a great deal about what is wrong with our family justice system and surely it cries out for a better way of dealing with the problems."

The high rates of self-representation in family cases will pose ongoing challenges for judges and lawyers, and will continue to result in frustration and concerns for litigants, both those with and without lawyers. At the same time, the vast majority of those with greater resources will continue to have legal representation, though often resolving their cases outside of the court system. This raises concerns about "two-tier" justice, with those who are wealthier tending to resolve disputes with lawyers outside the court system, and those with more limited means being unrepresented and resolving family disputes in an increasingly stressed family court system.

There have been many calls for major reforms to the family justice system from policy makers, judges, lawyers and the mental health community, as well as by those most affected by the family justice system, litigants.[33] Yet, there remains little empirical research that helps with understanding about what works effectively and what does not. Too frequently services have been put into the family justice system without proper evaluation and a proper understanding of the impacts. There is very little empirical research, in Canada or elsewhere, that follows litigants and their children through the different stages of the litigation process and that assesses the effect on outcomes of different methods of dispute resolution. Policy and structural reforms remain scattered and limited, despite the increasing number of self-represented litigants in the family courts and the concerns that outcomes, especially for children, vulnerable women and victims of domestic violence may be negatively affected by the lack of advice and representation. Moreover, knowing that some of the self-represented and represented litigants are satisfied with outcomes or services does not address issues related to costs to the justice system – to courts, lawyers, litigants – of self-representation, nor does it answer questions about the effect of lack of representation on outcomes for children of separated and divorced families.

In an unreported 2009 Ontario Family Court decision, Thomson J awarded $10,000 in costs against a father who had never lived with a child but sought custody, observing: "prosecuting unmeritorious claims is never reasonable, regardless of whether a party is represented or not;" see Luckham v Molleson (unreported August 26, 2009, Kingston, Ontario).

There is a need for government, professional groups and scholars to undertake interdisciplinary collaborative research to better understand the costs and benefits of various policy and program initiatives but also what is working well and what is not working well across the globe. This type of research is essential if appropriate use is to be made of the resources and programs or further reforms are to be undertaken. Children and victims of domestic violence, in particular should expect nothing less from the family justice system.

The Implications of Salary for the Quality of Nominations to the Federal District Courts, 1964–2012

Many have expressed concern over the working conditions of federal district court judges who face comparatively low salaries in contrast to those in peer professions. As a means of enticing new judges of the highest quality, Chief Justices Rehnquist and Roberts have urged Congress and the president to increase judicial pay. However, scholars have not conducted a systematic, empirical investigation of whether higher salaries do, in fact, attract better prospective judges. We turn our attention to this issue. We first develop an exhaustive dataset of ABA ratings for over 1,800 nominees to the federal district courts from 1964 to 2012. We next model the effects of salary on the quality of nominations and confirmations. We find that salary is an important determinant of both the quality of candidates nominated and those confirmed to the federal bench. Our findings have critical implications for public policy, as our results confirm the need for better pay for federal judges.

KEYWORDS: judicial appointment, district courts, trial courts, judicial selection

A common theme in recent year-end reports on the state of the judiciary is the dire need to implement cost of living adjustments for federal judges.[1] In his 2005 report, Chief Justice Roberts argued, "Our system of justice suffers as the real salary of judges continues to decline... Every time a judge leaves the bench for a higher paying job, the independence fostered by life tenure is weakened. Every time a potential nominee refuses to be considered, the pool of candidates from which judges are selected narrows" (5). Moreover, Roberts has urged Congress to act quickly to confirm nominees, as these vacancies have "created acute difficulties" (2010 Report, 8). The increasing number of vacancies on the federal courts—exacerbated by delays in Senate confirmations—has resulted in greater pressure on the remaining judges to handle larger dockets. In this perspective, judges are underpaid and overburdened, which could have ramifications for careerism, enticing judges to leave the bench or dissuading prospective ones from seeking nominations.

Roberts has not been alone in his advocacy for better compensation. In his 2002 report, Chief Justice Rehnquist reiterated a common theme from prior year-end reports by noting, "In 1989, in testimony before Congress, I described the inadequacy of judicial salaries as 'the single greatest problem facing the Judicial Branch'... It remains the most pressing issue today" (p. 2). Then-Judge Breyer in 1992 also opined on the increased likelihood "that those who seek judicial office will see that office as a temporary assignment, leaving it after a time for better paid work in the private sector" (Breyer 1992, 7). Beyond the justices, several notable organizations have petitioned Congress for better remuneration. The American Bar Association (ABA) stated that "...inadequate judicial pay undermines commitment to lifetime tenure by deterring candidates from seeking appointment to the bench and discouraging judges from remaining on the bench" (ABA 2010).[2] Similar concerns have been expressed by the American College of Trial Lawyers[3] and deans of numerous law schools.[4] In like manner to Chief Justice Roberts, the ABA has argued that the independence of the federal judiciary is threatened as judicial salaries fail to keep pace with peer professions.[5]

As the preceding discussion suggests, low compensation has several implications for the careerism of judges: one, that judges are leaving office early to pursue more lucrative opportunities; two, that the quality of judges' work has been affected; and three, that those who would otherwise consider a federal judgeship have "refused to be considered" and sought careers elsewhere. Of these three policy consequences, considerable attention has been paid to the first. Most studies have found little evidence that salary matters for retirement decisions, both for federal district court and court of appeals judges. Instead, the vast majority of judges retain their positions until they are eligible for a pension, and they then either serve in a part-time capacity as senior status judges or retire (Yoon 2003, 2005, 2006; Vining 2009). However, for the judges who resign from the bench prior to pension eligibility, recent evidence shows that salary could be a factor in their decision calculus (Hansford, Savchak, and Songer 2010; Choi, Gulati, and Posner 2013). In a comprehensive study of district court judges' careerism, Burbank, Plager, and Ablavsky (2012) find evidence that comports with the Hansford et al. (2010) findings. Based on surveys of federal court judges, Burbank et al. note that resignations over the past four decades were motivated most commonly by "...return to private practice, appointment to other office, and inadequate salary" (12). Moreover, a number of those returning to private practice do so for reasons of better compensation.

Regarding the second consequence, several scholars have examined whether productivity has been affected by low salaries. Choi, Gulati, and Posner (2009) offer little support for the claim that higher salaries increase the quality of opinions judges produce. This is consistent with Baker (2008), who finds that the sole effect of salary is that judges dissent less often in controversial cases. That is, Baker (2008) finds no discernible effect for whether judges of varying political parties write similarly strong opinions, whether they voice policy preferences in a similar ideological direction, or whether they take longer to decide cases. According to the author, "Given the available data, the effect of low judicial pay is non-existent" (112).[6] Some more recent scholarship finds workload considerations can influence the quality of judicial opinions on the Supreme Court (Black and Owens 2013) and the sources justices rely on in drafting opinions (Szmer and Ginn 2014). These latter findings are mirrored at the state supreme court level, where salary, as a component of judicial professionalism, predicts judicial prestige (Squire 2008).

However, researchers have not devoted attention to the third concern—that qualified candidates have been deterred from seeking positions in the judiciary as a result of low salaries. A 2010 cross-national study of European systems by Cross and Donelson (2010) finds higher salaries increase judicial quality. Concerning the United States, Yoon (2006) states, "any adverse effect of salary is likely occurring to an individual's willingness to join the bench, not to remain once confirmed" (176). We address this claim empirically. We turn our attention to the implications of salary for those nominated to the federal bench over time. We focus our analysis at the level of the district courts, the typical entry point to the federal judiciary—and conveniently for our analysis, the level also offering the highest number of cases. As the entry point, it is here where the adverse effects of salary should be most pronounced, as candidates for the district courts who are deterred by low wages will not enter the pool of potential nominees.[7] Our study covers a broad period of time, 1964 through 2012, which affords considerable variance in compensation and includes a prodigious number of nominees, over 1,800 in total. As we show, salary has meaningful consequences for the quality of candidates nominated to the federal courts. In a period when social science research has, at times, faced external criticism for a failure of policy relevance, our results have significance for public policy, as they speak to the need for better remuneration for judges if the federal courts are to attract the best and brightest candidates.

THE EFFECT OF SALARY ON THE POOL OF PROSPECTIVE FEDERAL JUDGES

In order to understand the theoretical effects of salary on behavior, we begin by considering the process of selecting judges. In his seminal work, Picking Federal Judges, Goldman (1997) argued that presidents can pursue multiple goals when choosing nominees, including selecting candidates for ideological reasons or rewarding political allies for their patronage. More recently, [6]Baker's (2008) findings generated a series of reactions in a subsequent volume of the Boston University Law Review (Zorn, Henderson, and Czarnezki 2008; Cross 2008; Marks 2008).

[7]As those serving on higher levels of the federal judiciary have often served previously as district court judges, then those judges and justices will have already accepted a "lower salary."

much has been written on the role of political and institutional forces acting on the president during the appointment process, with focus on the role of senatorial courtesy, polarization, and the ideological distance separating the president and key member of the Senate (see, for example, Epstein and Segal 2005, Shipan and Shannon 2003, and Binder and Maltzman 2009). Our work does not discount the political and institutional factors that shape the nomination process. Rather, we suggest that less desirable working conditions act as an additional constraint on the selection process—that when salaries are low, the pool of candidates seeking nomination attenuates.

We assume that, on average, presidents would prefer to select candidates of quality. If a president wishes to nominate candidates who are like-minded, the president will desire that such ideological appointees also be highly qualified. Presidents who nominate poorly qualified candidates could face criticism from the media and pundits. Moreover, evidence from the lower federal courts suggests that highly qualified prospective judges are less likely to face delays in confirmation (Martinek, Kemper, and VanWinkle 2002; Solowiej, Martinek, and Brunnell 2005; Shipan and Shannon 2003; Stratmann and Garner 2004; Holmes, Shamode and Hartley 2012), particularly when the president and the Senate are ideologically distant from each other (Sen and Spaniel 2015).[8] Presidents may strive to make political appointments or reward friends, but we argue that at times when salaries are lower, presidents are forced to select such nominees from a truncated pool of candidates.

If the claims of Chief Justices Rehnquist and Roberts and several other notable followers of the courts are valid, then better qualified candidates are dissuaded from considering a career in the federal courts when compensation is low, and thereby they opt out of the pool of nominees. Thus nominations made from this truncated pool will be of lesser quality in years with lower salaries. By extension, we should also expect that judges confirmed from among the pool of nominees will also be of lesser quality. Even as potential salaries in peer institutions have increased and outside opportunities can appear financially rewarding, we argue that pay remains an important driver of interest in serving in the federal judiciary.

DATA FOR NOMINEES TO THE FEDERAL DISTRICT COURTS

Due to severe data constraints, one cannot reliably locate the set of candidates who are in or out of the pool over time. Even what is meant by "the pool" is difficult to conceptualize, as it is unclear who should be included or excluded. Even for recent periods, reliable data are not available concerning, for example, who was interested in the federal courts, who pursued nomination, who senators and other proposed, who the president considered, and who declined an invitation.[9] Moreover, finding reliable data across districts over the past several decades, which is necessary to have sufficient variance in salary and in the quality of judges, is not possible. What scholars can observe, however, are those candidates nominated by the president and considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee. There are two reasons that we can have confidence in observing the effects of salary on these prospective judges. First, estimates of the effects of salary on ratings of quality will be, if anything, biased conservatively. According to King, Keohane, and Verba (1994), "any selection rule correlated with the dependent variable attenuates estimates of the causal effects on average" (130). Thus the effects of salary on quality will likely be even more pronounced than what we can observe in our research design. Second, although scholars may have some concern over the quality of those who are (or are not) in the pool, in the end, nominations and confirmations are what matter for the performance of the federal judiciary. These are the candidates who, upon successful confirmation, will serve on the federal bench. If we observe then, on average, better qualified nominees and confirmed judges in years of better pay, then we have evidence that higher salaries entice better candidates.

[8]Binder and Maltzman (2009) find that those with higher ABA ratings are not less likely to face delays. See Table 4.3, p. 96, of their work.

[9]The closest exception is the data located on nominations by Eisenhower and Ford, as published in Rottinghaus and Bergen (2011) and Rottinghaus and Nicholson (2010).

MEASURING QUALITY

To assess the quality of nominees in the face of varying salaries, we rely on the ratings of the American Bar Association, an interest group that has, over a long period of time, compiled detailed information on nominees' past experiences and temperaments. ABA ratings have been interpreted as meaningful signals of the quality of nominees and confirmed judges by numerous scholars, and they have been an important indicator of quality for most presidents and senators (Slotnick 1983a, 1983b; Goldman 1997; Haire 2001; Nixon and Goss, 2001; Binder and Maltzman 2002; Martinek, Kemper and VanWinkle 2002; Shipan and Shannon 2003; Epstein and Segal 2005; Binder and Maltzman, 2009; Sen 2014). Valid and reliable alternative measures of quality, such as the Choi and Gulati ratings, are not available for the district courts over as broad of a time period as what we examine, thereby limiting both the variance on salary and the size of the pool of nominees. We do acknowledge that ABA ratings have not been without their critics. Navarro Smelcer, Steigerwalt, and Vining (2011) find evidence of political bias in the scores, revisiting a much disputed question (Lott 2001; Lindgren 2001; Saks and Vidmar 2001). Work has found that women (Slotnick 1983a, 1983b) and minorities (Haire 2001) tend to receive lower ratings from the ABA, findings most recently confirmed by Sen (2014). Further, President George W. Bush discounted ABA scores when making nominations, and his nominees were rated later in the process (Goldman 2007; Goldman, Schiavoni and Slotnick 2009; Binder and Maltzman 2009). Fourth, our results suggest that the quality of nominees has increased over time. And while it is beyond the scope of this study to delve into this finding more systematically, there are potential avenues that future work can explore. One is that there are more highly qualified candidates due to increased opportunities for work experience that the ABA values in rating candidates. Our period of analysis begins during a time when even college was available to a select few, much less law school. In that vein, there are more entrants into law schools in recent decades than previous ones, and the number of law schools perceived as quality institutions has grown. Add to those trends greater opportunities for judicial clerkships and a higher availability of state judgeships, and the finding that quality has increased appears much more intuitive—despite evidence that the gap between salaries in the federal courts and those of peer professions has increased. Indeed, our results on increasing quality over time suggest that such an income gap is less alarming than others have claimed.

Fortunately, for several reasons, these concerns can be mitigated. First, although salaries for district court judges reached their apex in the late 1960s, there is considerable variance even from year to year, such that even within a single presidential administration, salaries can rise and fall considerably. Consider, for example, the Carter administration. As we show in a subsequent figure, salaries (in 2012 dollar values to facilitate comparison) were nearly 29,000 dollars higher in 1977 than in 1976, but then, due to inflation, salaries fell approximately 14,500 dollars from 1977 to 1978, rose 2,500 dollars in 1979, and then fell over 7,500 dollars in 1980. Thus even if political bias exists in the ABA ratings, such that candidates nominated by presidents of a certain political party are advantaged, it remains true that the ebbs and flows in salary should have implications for quality even within a given administration. Second, our statistical models can add controls for both race and gender to help account for such bias in the ratings, and thus we included measures of whether the nominee or confirmed judge was African-American and/or female. Third, ABA rankings are a sign of quality at the time of nomination, which is the point of time most consequential for our analysis. The scores signal quality, regardless of whether presidents make use of them in their nomination decision. We are able to interpret the rating as meaningful, even if certain presidents ostensibly discounted them (e.g., Nixon, George W. Bush), or even if the ABA score for a given judge did not comport with his or her subsequent performance on the bench. As for the ABA eliminating the exceptionally well-qualified rating, the actual number of prospective judges receiving this rating was very small—only 2.2 percent of all nominees. Previous work using ABA ratings over time has pooled these nominations with the well-qualified ones (Binder and Maltzman 2009), as do we. Finally, it is important to recognize that despite the ratings' shortcomings, the ABA ratings are the most valid and reliable indicator of the quality of nominations available over the entire period of analysis. They represent the best effort to consistently measure quality using multiple dimensions incorporating the professional and educational backgrounds of the nominees.

An important first step, and notable data contribution, is to compile ABA ratings for 1,836 nominees to the district court beginning with the start of the Lyndon Johnson administration through the first term of the Obama administration. The period covers a substantial number of judges and affords considerable variance in salary. Our data collection represents the most comprehensive recording of nominee data to date, and we now briefly describe the process for locating the nominees and their respective ABA ratings, a multi-step process. We collected data on quality, salary, and other variables at the time of the first initial nomination. For those judges ultimately confirmed, we also collected the same measures at the date of the successful nomination that led to the confirmation. We located the time of first nomination and, if relevant, the successful nomination through either print and online publications of the Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate of the United States of America. The process for procuring ABA data depended on the type of nomination: whether the nominee was confirmed without need for renomination; whether a candidate was renominated and ultimately confirmed; or whether the nominee was never confirmed, as we describe below. For all nominees, due to the limits of data availability over our entire period of analysis, we rely on the rating of the majority of the ABA committee.[10]

For the first type—nominees confirmed without the need for renomination—ABA ratings were accessed through through the Federal Judicial Center's (FJC) online directory, "Biographical Directory of Federal Judges." Of our 1,836 nominations, 1,515 (82.5 percent) were nominated [10]Information on the minority ratings would be valuable when candidates did not receive a unanimous rating, but these data are missing for much of the early portion of our period of analysis, the same period when salaries reached their zenith. We were not able to locate information on split ratings.

and confirmed. For the second type, if the subsequent renomination that led to confirmation was temporally close to the first nomination (occurred less than one year apart), then we again relied on the FJC for the rating. Here, though, we ensured that there was no change in the résumé of the candidate within the one year that could have altered their ABA rating. For the third and fourth types—those candidates whose first nomination occurred much earlier than their subsequent successful nomination; and those candidates who were not ultimately confirmed—we compiled ABA scores from several sources.[11] For nominees in years 1989 through 2012, we relied on data available electronically through the ABA's website. Prior to 1989, for a number of nominees, ABA ratings could be located in the archives of ProQuest Congressional, which offered access to transcripts of the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearings. These transcripts included either documentation of the ABA rating or direct references to the rating by senators. A second source included information compiled by faculty and research assistants for Picking Federal Judges (1997), which offered ABA scores for many of the failed nominees in the George H. W. Bush and Clinton administrations.[12] A third source included archival newspaper records available through Lexis Nexis Academic Universe, which occasionally made reference to a nominee's ABA rating. When these resources were exhausted, in a few instances, we were able to locate ABA ratings through Internet searches using the name of the failed nominee and the state of the court to which she or he had been nominated. With all of these methods combined, we were able to uncover ABA ratings for all but 9 of 1,836 nominees.[13] Thus our dataset offers nominee data and ABA ratings for 1,827 candidates nominated to the federal district courts between 1964 and 2012, the most exhaustive ABA data compilation to date. It represents an important data contribution for future scholars to exploit.[14]

To offer perspective on ABA scores for nominees over time, we present both a table and an accompanying figure. To ease interpretation, in both the table and figure, we focus on ABA nominee data by presidential administration. In looking at the first column of Table 1, one can see that the ABA included the rating of exceptionally well-qualified for the period of 1964 through 1988. Only 40 of our 1,836 nominees qualified for this rating. Moving to the second column, a total of 973 candidates were rated as well-qualified, which comprises the majority rating (53.3 percent) for all nominations. Nominees rated qualified number 792 over the period of analysis. Lastly, one can see that the not qualified rating is the exception—only 1.2 percent of all nominees received this rating. A number of presidential administrations had 0 nominees who were rated as not qualified. The final column lists the total number of nominees by administration. We can see here that Carter was able to nominate the largest number of prospective judges, while Nixon's shortened second administration and Ford's administration accounted for the lowest numbers. Concerning the most recent administration, the number of first-term Obama nominations is on par with that of George W. Bush's first term.

[11]For some candidates, the window of time between their first nomination and the nomination that was ultimately successful was considerable. As an example, Sue Myerscough was first nominated by Clinton on October 11, 1995. She was later nominated by Obama on January 5, 2011, and confirmed.

[12]We thank the author for making these data available to us.

[13]One missing nominee is Len Paletta, who died shortly after his nomination in early 1978. A second is Michael O'Neill, who was nominated in 2008 but was not rated by the ABA.

[14]All nominee data will be made publicly available upon article publication.

In order to better visualize the difference in well-qualified versus qualified nominations over time, we offer a bar chart of the percent of well-qualified and qualified nominees by administration. In like manner to other studies using ABA ratings over time, both here and in our subsequent statistical analyses, we pool the 40 candidates (2.2 percent of all nominees) rated exceptionally well-qualified with those rated well-qualified (Binder and Maltzman, 2009). Figure 1 shows that certain presidential administrations, namely both of the George W. Bush terms and the first Clinton term, were characterized for being remarkably successful at recruiting well-qualified candidates. For George W. Bush, well-qualified nominees more than doubled those rated qualified. The figure also shows that well-qualified candidates have become more common over time. In all but Clinton's second administration, since 1985, well-qualified nominees have exceeded qualified ones. This finding is interesting, as the past thirty years also represents the period when salaries in the private sector have outpaced those of the federal judiciary (Rutkus 2008). Despite the growing disparities in pay, the federal courts are still able to attract a substantial number of well-qualified nominees.

MEASURES

We now turn to a discussion of the measures used in the subsequent statistical models to shed light on the relationship among salary and the quality of nominees. For our models, the dependent variable is a dichotomous indicator of the ABA rating, where 1 equals well-qualified (and exceptionally well-qualified) and 0 equals qualified. Again because the ABA dropped the exceptionally well-qualified rating, and only a small percentage of district court nominees received this rating, we pool these prospective judges into the well-qualified category, coded 1. (See Binder and Maltzmann 2009 for a similar approach.)[15] We also drop the 22 nominees rated as not qualified from our analysis (1.2 percent of all nominees), because these prospective judges may be categorically distinct from other nominees, given that the rating was used so infrequently.[16] Thus our model captures the effect of increases in salary on the likelihood of receiving a high rating from the ABA.

Our principal explanatory variable concerns the annual salary of district court judges. Salary is the annual measure of an extant judges' compensation at the time of nomination.[17] All salary measures are adjusted for inflation, to 2012 dollar values, so that comparisons can be made over time.[18] To offer some sense of the variance in compensation over time, we present both nominal

[15]If we do not pool these potential judges, we are temporally limited in making inferences about the effect of salary. That is, the analysis must end with the end of the Reagan administration.

[16]We estimated models with unqualified candidates included where non-qualified and qualified nominees are coded 0 and well-qualified and exceptionally well-qualified candidates are coded 1. In these models, the results are substantively the same as the models presented below. We do not include non-qualified nominees in the models presented below because their low number (22) and the stark differences between a qualified and non-qualified candidate. However, the non-qualified models are available in the Appendix in Table A1.

[17]Of course, another consideration would be the future salaries of judges, but nominees have little information to forecast when the next salary increase will arrive, nor are they able to judge the effect of future inflation on their remuneration.

and inflation adjusted salary data in Figure 2. Nominal data are represented by a thin line, with the corresponding y-axis on the left. Inflation-adjusted data are represented by a bolded line, with the corresponding y-axis on the right. Because salaries often changed midyear in the earlier period of analysis, the data are recorded in months. For ease of interpretation, the x-axis includes tick marks for January and July of each year. As one can see, earnings were highest from March to December of 1969, with district court judges receiving over 250,000 dollars in 2012 values. In contrast, judges, salaries fell to under 165,000 dollars from January to December of 1986. The figure demonstrates that salaries have fluctuated considerably over our period of analysis, and even within a given presidential administration, as we earlier discussed.[19]

Our other independent variables include a measure of the size of the court and the workload of judges. We include the number of Authorized Judgeships for the court to which the prospective judge was nominated at the time of his or her nomination. Larger courts are associated with areas with more dense populations—areas that tend to include more firms, law schools, and other private-sector opportunities. As a result, we should expect that the pool of nominees in these areas will be, on average, more qualified.[20] We also control for the workload of extant judges on the court to which the nominee is appointed. Some evidence suggests that higher caseload responsibilities drive judges to leave office early (Spriggs and Wahlbeck, 1995; Hansford, Savchak, and Songer, 2010), and thus higher caseloads could deter potential qualified nominees. We record Weighted Case Filings, published annually for each district court by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Among the measures of caseload introduced in Habel and Scott (2014), Weighted Case Filings best captures the perception nominees would have of the workload of the district courts, as the measure adjusts filings according to the work required to oversee them. For each nominee, we record the most recently published data according to their time of the nomination.[21] Our expectation is that the sign of the coefficient for this variable will be negative, as higher caseloads should deter better qualified nominees.

(http://www.bls.gov/data/inflation_calculator.htm). In our subsequent statistical models, salary is recorded in thousands of dollars. Although it would be helpful to have salary information available by district, we cannot locate reliable inflation-adjusted data for each district going back annually to 1964. Earlier models also included an annual Change in Inflation-Adjusted Salary measure, which was not statistically significant, and thus dropped from this analysis.

Finally, we include two measures capturing the race and gender of the candidates, and a third measure for the Nomination Year of the nominee.[22] Concerning the demographic variables, because earlier studies have demonstrated that women and African-American candidates tend to receive lower ABA ratings (Slotnick 1983a, 1983b; Haire 2001; Sen 2014), we control for these effects by the inclusion of dichotomous indicators for both. Because the claims of Chief Justice Roberts would have us believe that the quality of those being nominated at the present time has decreased from that of an earlier period because the disparity between salaries in the public and private sectors has grown, we include a final variable capturing the year of nomination.[23] We should expect that the sign of the coefficient for this variable is negative; however, our descriptive statistics above suggest quality has actually increased over time.[24]

MODELS OF QUALITY FOR NOMINEES

Our theoretical expectation is that we will observe better-qualified nominations and confirmations in periods when salary is high. We now turn to our statistical analysis to test these claims. As our dependent variable is dichotomous, we estimate a series of logit models. Because all those who are nominated in a given year experience the same salary, we report robust standard errors, with [20]We could not locate reliable measures of annual population by district from 1964 to 2012.

[21]We recorded weighted case filings in hundreds of cases. We use the filings data published for a given court immediately prior to the date of nomination. For example, for a judge nominated to the District of Maine on November 1, 1983, we would record the weighted case filings for the District of Maine for the period July 1, 1982 to June 30, 1983.

[22]Additional models incorporated measures for political factors, including Judicial Common Space distance scores and an updated series of Goldman's (2003) obstruction and delay index. In these models, we found that our salary variable remained positive and statistically significant, as did Nomination Year. However, political factors are not significant. Both of these models are presented in the Appendix in Tables A2 and A3.

[24]We also estimate additional models that did not include this trend variable, but rather included dummy variables by administration, with the Obama administration as the excluded category. In these models, we found consistent substantive results concerning the effects of salary, and the signs and statistical significance of the dummies for administration showed that quality has increased over time.

clustering by the year of nomination.[25] If the claims of the chief justices and others are valid, we should observe that salary predicts quality.

In Table 2, we present two models: the first for all nominees, and a second for those who were subsequently confirmed. For the nominee model, the ABA ratings, salary, and other explanatory variables are measured at the time of the candidate's first nomination to the federal courts, whether successful or unsuccessful. For the confirmed judges' model, the data are from the date of the nomination that led to a successful confirmation.[26] As one can see, the N for the confirmed model is lower, as these judges are a subset of all nominees.

In looking at the results, in both models, we find that salary is an important factor in accounting for the quality of candidates nominated to the district courts. The sign of the coefficient on Salary is positive and statistically significant across both specifications.[27] We also find that courts with more authorized judgeships attract better-qualified candidates. These areas correspond to a wider pool, including a greater number of private practice attorneys and state and lower court judges. We also see that the year of nomination is positive and significant, with more recent years featuring better-qualified candidates. Again, this finding runs counter to the claim that as the gap between [25]The total number of nominees during our period of analysis is 1,836. Our N for our nominee model is 1,784, however. As we noted, we were missing ABA scores for 9 nominees. A remaining 18 potential judges were nominated in periods where caseload data is unavailable, particularly for the District of Columbia from 1964 through 1973.

[26]As we described earlier, for some judges, the time between their unsuccessful and subsequent successful nomination was short, oftentimes less than one year. But for other judges, the window was much longer.

[27]We estimated additional multi-level models and found the substantive results for salary to be robust. However, since Steenbergen and Jones (2002) note that clustered standard errors function akin to multi-level models while also mitigating concerns over specification error, we opt to not include the multi-level models in this article.

salaries in the private sector has grown, the quality of candidates nominated to the court has decreased. Lastly, we find that our demographic variables are statistically significant, with results consistent with the literature that shows that women and African-Americans are less likely to receive a well-qualified rating.

Concerning the magnitude of the effect of salary on the quality of judges, because we use logit models, the coefficients are difficult to interpret directly. Thus we estimate the effect on the likelihood of nominating (or confirming) a well-qualified candidate as salary changes from its lowest to highest values.[28] For the first model, we find that raising salary from its lowest value to its highest increases the probability of a well-qualified candidate by 0.085. For the confirmed judges model, we find that raising salary from the lowest to highest values increases the probability of confirming a well-qualified candidate by 0.099. Although these effects may not seem large, an 8.5 to 10 percent increase in the likelihood of nominating a well-qualified candidate simply by increasing pay should not be trivialized, given the importance of the office represented.

DISCUSSION

We have considered the effects of salary on the decision to join the federal judiciary. In doing so, we have developed an exhaustive dataset of nominees and their respective ABA ratings. The arguments from Chief Justice Roberts and others have claimed that low judicial pay can threaten the very integrity of the federal courts. Without talented and committed judges who perceive their position on the federal courts as the pinnacle of their careers, the courts would be unable to dispose effectively of the cases before it and fulfill its role in our system. Our findings suggest that salary has important consequences for the quality of nominees to the district courts. Our models demonstrate that well-qualified judges are more likely to be nominated when salaries are higher.

Our results should be considered in a broader context. First, concerning salary, it is notable that the mean level of compensation is less than 200,000 dollars during our period of analysis (in 2012 dollar values); that salary has risen above 225,000 dollars for only 34 months over our entire 53-year period; and that the maximum salary in mid-to late 1969 is just over 250,000 dollars in 2012 values. What we cannot observe, then, is the effect of salaries substantially greater than 250,000 dollars on attracting prospective judges. We already find salary to be an important incentive for better-qualified candidates, and one is left to wonder what the consequences of having salaries that keep pace with peer institutions would be. Moreover, higher pay might ensure that the federal district bench is more reflective of the nation writ large. Second, an increase in judicial pay could lead to a lower reliance on information provided by interest groups as amici, as higher-quality judges are better able to craft their own opinions without outside information (Szmer and Ginn 2014). Third, concerning our measure of quality, we have focused on the distinction between well-qualified candidates and qualified candidates, as rated by the ABA. It is important to note that few nominees have been designated "not qualified," regardless of how low salaries had fallen. Thus it could be that followers of the federal courts will perceive our results as less than a mandate for better pay. If the level of competence and ability demonstrated by nominees rated qualified is satisfactory, then the need for increasing salaries is not as pressing a concern.

[28]We use CLARIFY in Stata 12 (Tomz, Wittenberg, and King 2003) for both models, examining the first difference in the predicted probability for lowest and highest salaries. We set the size of the court to the median; caseload to the median; the nomination year to 2012; and the race and gender of the candidate to be the modal category, a Caucasian male.

Fourth, our results suggest that the quality of nominees has increased over time. And while it is beyond the scope of this study to interpret this finding, there are many potential explanations. One is that the ABA's rating standards have simply changed over the years. Additionally, the increasingly polarized and scrutinized nature of judicial nominations may force contemporary presidents to nominate more qualified nominees than their predecessors.

We are left with several avenues for future research. We have examined the effect of salary on nominees, but one can turn greater attention to the various potential effects of salaries for those serving on the federal bench. Particularly since the workload of federal district court judges has increased in recent decades, future work might explore the relationship between productivity and salary. It could also be that lower salaries have consequences for the general morale of extant judges, an area insufficiently explored by scholars. Interviews with judges and more qualitatively orientated research could aid in addressing these important issues. Second, more work should investigate the puzzle of the rise in quality of nominees in the face of increasing salaries at peer institutions. Qualitative studies should investigate how presidents recruit candidates for the judiciary in the face of these trends. Third, our study could be carried out at the courts of appeals level to determine whether we observe similar consequences there as well. Already some work on state supreme courts suggests that low salaries are consequential for court productivity and prestige (Caldeira 1985; Squire 2008). Third, although issues with locating valid and reliable data arise, future work could consider additional measures of judicial quality beyond ABA scores, perhaps including other past experiences prior to nomination. Finally, and related, researchers could examine the implications for salary for the diversity of the federal bench—whether better salaries attract more women and minorities.

APPENDIX

Table A1 presents the results when non-qualified nominees are included. This model employs the same dependent variable, except non-qualified nominees are coded 0, along with qualified candidates. The results are substantively similar to those presented in Table 2.

Tables A2 and A3 present the same models as found in Table 2. However, in these models an additional control is included for Goldman's (2003) measure of obstruction, which we have updated through 2012, and a measure of the ideological distance between the president and the Senate from Epstein et al.'s (2007) Judicial Common Space. In both instances, the substantive results are the same and the additional variable fails to achieve statistical significance.[29] [29]The Judicial Common Space only extends to 2007, thus the last five years of our data are excluded from Table A3.

Un juge extraordinaire

* Professeure agrégée, Faculté de droit, Université de Montréal.

Splendeurs et Misères des courtisanes (1839-1847)

– Honoré de Balzac

Le juge imaginé par le législateur québécois sous le nouveau Code de procédure civile de 2016 est un juge extraordinaire[1]. Au-delà de ses qualités d'adjudicateur, il possède de vastes pouvoirs de gestion de l'instance et de conciliation, ainsi qu'un rôle multiforme qui prime celui des parties et leur maîtrise du dossier, propre au débat contradictoire. Ce nouveau rôle surprend, car il remet en question les assises et les fonctions classiques des tribunaux québécois. Le juge de droit privé québécois fut d'abord créateur de droit, juriste dans la pensée et interprète des textes de loi. Ensuite, au gré des réformes procédurales, l'idée du juge gestionnaire a germé, puis a pris une forme certaine avec la nouvelle culture judiciaire de 2003[2], pour enfin être consacrée avec le Code de 2016. C'est ainsi que le juge québécois est devenu premier gestionnaire d'une instance civile qui, depuis plusieurs décennies, était perçue par plusieurs comme étant inefficace, disproportionnée et inaccessible.

Le législateur souhaite, par le biais du nouveau Code de procédure civile, que le réel surhomme que se doit d'être le juge québécois puisse mieux encadrer cette instance civile dont l'efficience et l'efficacité lui échappent, qu'il puisse mieux anticiper et comprendre les enjeux de l'instance dès son commencement, qu'il sache évaluer la proportionnalité du protocole d'instance conclu par les parties et puisse savoir quand convoquer une conférence de gestion ou prendre une mesure de gestion, le tout en vertu d'une série d'indices guidés par les principes directeurs du Code. Tout au long de l'instance, le juge devra apprécier la proportionnalité procédurale et probatoire et justifier chacune de ses décisions en fonction de ce principe transcendant. Le juge québécois agira, entre autres, comme créateur, interprète, gestionnaire, (souvent) psychologue, administrateur et conciliateur. Il s'agit de beaucoup de qualificatifs pour une seule femme ou un seul homme. Le juge québécois réussira-t-il à atteindre l'idéal de justice du nouveau Code ? Réussira-t-il à être extraordinaire ? De grands espoirs sont portés envers ce code d'accès à la justice, ce code de justice privée et de justice publique.

Dans cet article, nous traiterons du rôle des tribunaux et des sanctions judiciaires sous le nouveau Code. Nous aborderons d'abord le pluralisme processuel du nouveau Code dans l'étude de ces principales dispositions porteuses de changement. Ensuite, nous aborderons l'évolution du rôle et des pouvoirs du juge. Sera ensuite discuté en détail le rôle multiforme du juge québécois par le biais de trois pôles d'actions. S'ensuivra une discussion relative au paradoxe double lié au rôle du juge en système hybride. Nous conclurons l'article par un propos d'ouverture au pôle technologique exercé par le juge extraordinaire.

1. LE PLURALISME PROCESSUEL DU NOUVEAU CODE

Un nouveau Code de procédure civile est entré en vigueur le 1er janvier 2016. Ce Code offre une refonte complète du droit procédural et processuel québécois, une refonte audacieuse, prometteuse. Le Code aspire à transformer le cœur du système de justice civile québécois en accueillant en son sein un éventail de modes de résolution des différends, autant privés que publics. Il innove, de même, en un Code de procédure civile publique, certes, mais aussi privée. Ainsi, le législateur québécois a permis, par le biais du nouveau Code, de promouvoir une idéologie de pluralisme processuel voulant que l'adjudication des litiges ne soit pas – ou plus – l'unique manière de résoudre les différends[3]. Par le fait même, le législateur a permis d'ouvrir et d'étendre le terrain d'exercice et de résolution des différends.

3. Voir, sur le concept de pluralisme processuel : Carrie MENKEL-MEADOW, Dispute Processing and Conflict Resolution. Theory, Practice, and Policy, Aldershot, Dartmouth Publishing Co. Ltd., 2003, p. xiv.

Parmi les nouveautés les plus significatives, on pense immédiatement au principe de priorisation des modes privés de prévention et de règlement des différends[4], lequel prend une importance renouvelée avec l'obligation de considération de ces modes avant le recours à l'instance civile traditionnelle[5], la mission de conciliation des tribunaux[6] et un meilleur encadrement en général des modes privés par le biais des nouveaux articles 1 à 7 du Code ainsi qu'un titre spécifique sur la médiation[7]. On pense aussi à tous ces principes de la justice civile nouveaux ou révisés, soit le principe de coopération entre les parties[8], le principe de bonne foi[9], le principe de préservation de la preuve[10], le principe de contradiction[11], le principe de proportionnalité probatoire[12], le principe de favorisation des moyens technologiques appropriés[13], parmi d'autres. Il s'agit ainsi non seulement d'un remaniement complet des règles, mais d'ajouts substantiels de nouvelles règles et sanctions, de nouveaux principes et pouvoirs.

Le titre du présent article a été choisi avec attention et rigueur. Ainsi, ce n'est pas un hasard que l'on ait choisi de qualifier le juge d'extraordinaire. C'est que sous le nouveau Code, la gestion de l'instance et les pouvoirs des tribunaux sont accrus de telle manière que le rôle du juge s'intensifie et se complique. Il fait de celui qui l'exerce quelqu'un de vraisemblablement extraordinaire.

11. Ibid., art. 17. Ce principe, inspiré du droit civil français et du principe du procès équitable, suppose une justice impartiale, neutre et équitable.
12. Ibid., art. 18. Nous parlons ici uniquement de proportionnalité « probatoire » car la proportionnalité procédurale existait déjà au Code de 2002 depuis la nouvelle culture judiciaire. Voir : Catherine PICHÉ, « La proportionnalité procédurale : une perspective comparative », (2010) 40 R.D.U.S. 551, 571 et 572. Pour la professeure Piché, « [c]'est donc dire que la proportionnalité est concernée non seulement par l'utilisation des services judiciaires publics par les parties au litige, mais également par l'utilisation de ces services par la population entière. Elle sert ainsi à assurer un usage optimal et équitable des services judiciaires publics par tous les citoyens. » (p. 572)
13. C.p.c., art. 26. Ici, le tribunal pourra même ordonner ou utiliser un tel moyen d'office, notamment dans la gestion des instances, et ainsi, malgré la convention des parties. Ce changement est majeur.

D'abord, le législateur rééquilibre les pouvoirs en octroyant la priorité au juge dans la gestion de l'instance par rapport à la maîtrise du dossier par les parties[14]. Il donne, dans les faits, une plus grande autorité au juge dans la gestion de l'instance. Parmi les principes directeurs de la procédure, il investit les tribunaux de la « mission d'assurer la saine gestion des instances en accord avec les principes et les objectifs de la procédure » (art. 9, al. 2 C.p.c.). Il prévoit également que les parties « ont, sous réserve du devoir des tribunaux d'assurer la saine gestion des instances et de veiller à leur bon déroulement, la maîtrise du dossier » (art. 19, al. 1 C.p.c.). Par le fait même, on pourra se demander si le système dit « adversatif » ne s'en trouve pas menacé. Selon le professeur J. A. Jolowicz, le système adversatif repose sur les deux valeurs fondamentales et fondatrices suivantes : la responsabilisation des parties à l'instance dans la définition du sujet et de l'objet du litige, ainsi que la liberté accordée aux parties de décider quelle information le juge peut utiliser dans son adjudication[15]. Le choix de donner de plus grands pouvoirs aux tribunaux dans la gestion d'instance transforme-t-il le système québécois en système inquisitoire[16] ? Nous y reviendrons[17].

Ensuite, le nouveau Code force le juge à intervenir plus tôt dans l'instance, à l'étape du dépôt du protocole de l'instance, par le biais de son examen systématique de ce protocole (art. 150 C.p.c.). Un des juges de la chambre de gestion d'instance décidera si le dossier doit

14. Ibid., art. 19, al. 1. Ainsi, par cet article, le législateur encadre mieux le devoir de maîtrise du dossier par les parties en l'associant au respect des règles de la procédure et des délais établis, ainsi qu'aux principes et objectifs de la procédure. Il précise, de même, que la mission des tribunaux d'assurer la saine gestion est faite nécessairement sous réserve de cette mission et de cette responsabilité. faire l'objet d'une conférence de gestion, en fonction d'une liste d'indices inspirés des principes directeurs du Code, des principes directeurs de la procédure (art. 150 C.p.c.). En fait, le juge pourra même avoir à apprécier les démarches judiciaires[18] et préjudiciaires[19] des parties alors qu'il apprécie l'accomplissement de l'objectif de proportionnalité dans les procédures, la preuve et les démarches, en vertu de l'article 18 C.p.c.[20]. Le juge s'assurera que les parties ont veillé à ce que l'affaire soit limitée à « ce qui est nécessaire pour résoudre le litige » (art. 19, al. 2 C.p.c.). En fait, le législateur met à la disposition du juge et des tribunaux une grande variété de mesures que ces derniers peuvent prendre « d'office ou sur demande » et « à tout moment de l'instance »[21]. Ainsi, tout au long de l'instance, le juge pourra intervenir pour convoquer des conférences de gestion et pour prendre des mesures de gestion[22]. Il pourra exercer un certain nombre de pouvoirs d'office et sanctionner les parties notamment pour abus de procédure[23] ou pour manquements importants dans le déroulement de l'instance[24].

En somme, le législateur reconnaît par la réforme que le juge doit intervenir de manière active tout au long de l'instance, dès le dépôt de la demande introductive d'instance, en gardant un œil vigilant sur les procédures et sur le processus choisi par les parties, le tout dans l'optique de s'assurer que les procédés sont « adéquats, efficients, empreints d'esprit de justice », et que la justice est économique, accessible et proportionnée[25]. Mais il y a plus. Le législateur reconnaît aussi le principe de pluralisme processuel, en vertu duquel chaque procédé de résolution des différends, incluant le litige, a sa

19. Nous osons présumer de cette couverture préjudiciaire de par l'ouverture, à l'article 2 C.p.c., à l'éventualité d'un protocole préjudiciaire et à la nouvelle obligation de considération des modes privés, au troisième aliéna de l'article premier du Code, qui implique que les parties aient discuté de l'éventualité et de la possibilité de tenter de régler le différend par les modes privés avant d'intenter l'action.
20. À cet égard, le juge assume le devoir de vérifier si les démarches et les actes des parties et de leurs procureurs, eu égard aux coûts et au temps qu'ils exigent, sont « proportionnés à la nature et à la complexité de l'affaire et à la finalité de la demande ».

fonction et sa moralité propres[26]. Lorsque la fonctionnalité d'un procédé est identifiée, le meilleur lieu pour agir et régler le différend est choisi. Ainsi, si notamment l'objectif est d'éviter d'emmener un différend devant les tribunaux alors que l'aboutissement anticipé semble vouloir favoriser l'une des parties et que ces dernières ont l'ouverture et la volonté nécessaires pour négocier, on peut penser que le meilleur lieu pour résoudre le différend est la médiation devant un médiateur privé. Or, le choix d'un mode de résolution ou d'un autre aura un impact sur le résultat, sur l'aboutissement du litige pour les parties. Il en reste, néanmoins, que le seul fait de permettre aux parties de choisir leur mode de résolution laisse à présumer une plus grande équité dans les résultats.

2. L'ÉVOLUTION DU RÔLE[27] DU JUGE QUÉBÉCOIS : VARIATIONS SUR UN MÊME THÈME À TRAVERS LES ANNÉES

En se replongeant dans l'historique de la procédure civile québécoise, on remarque que le rôle du juge a évolué et s'est compliqué terriblement depuis les 15 dernières années. En fait, il faut bien souligner que sous le Code civil du Bas Canada, le juge québécois était un simple arbitre ou adjudicateur, un « liquidateur » de litiges, « selon une juste conception de la justice »[28]. À cette époque, les

Educ.* 4, 10 : « While more choices of process might appear to improve substantive outcomes, especially with more party participation, each process produces its own morality (an insight we owe to legal philosopher and practitioner Lon Fuller) and structures its own solutions and outcomes ».

27. On aurait pu reprendre aussi l'expression « office du juge », choisie notamment par Antoine Garapon et très largement utilisée en procédure civile française. Voir : RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE, INSTITUT DES HAUTES ÉTUDES SUR LA JUSTICE, La prudence et l'autorité. L'office du juge au XXIe siècle, Paris, 2013, p. 15, en ligne, <www.ihej.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/07/rapport_office_du_juge_mai_2013.pdf>. Il y définit, l'« office » du juge comme étant « le foyer de sens de la fonction de juger », une notion englobant le rôle et les fonctions du juge, certes, mais aussi la légitimité et la discrétion requises. C'est bien ici le sens de notre pensée sur la question, mais nous choisissons volontairement de restreindre l'analyse au rôle du juge. Voir aussi : Loïc CADIET et Emmanuel JEULAND, Droit judiciaire privé, 7e éd., Paris, LGDJ, 2011, nos 75 et s.

parties avaient « la libre disposition et de la matière litigieuse et de l'administration du procès »[29]. Selon l'ancien juge Marceau, le législateur de 1966 a voulu dégager le juge des « restrictions que lui imposait la procédure de 1896 », laquelle « cherchait trop à lui imposer une passivité quasi-totale à l'intérieur d'un certain nombre de règles de jeu imposées aux litigants »[30]. À cette époque, le législateur autorise le tribunal à proroger des délais qui ne sont pas de rigueur, ou encore à redresser tout grief d'irrégularité sur lequel serait fondé un moyen préliminaire, étend le pouvoir discrétionnaire des tribunaux dans l'appréciation de l'intérêt requis pour agir, permet de redresser les impropriétés dans les conclusions, ou encore, la réouverture d'enquête[31]. Ainsi, comme l'indique habilement le juge Marceau,

> On a presque l'impression qu'on a voulu introduire le concept du juge-providence. L'arbitre d'autrefois s'humanise : il ne descend pas dans l'arène mais il est très loin du spectateur impassible qui aurait pour seule mission de compter les coups que se portent les adversaires sans avoir les moyens de les aider, même au nom de la justice.[32]

Avec le révolutionnaire Rapport Ferland, déposé le 28 août 2001 et intitulé Une nouvelle culture judiciaire[33], le Comité de révision de la procédure civile a souhaité établir une justice civile plus rapide, efficace et moins dispendieuse. Ainsi, la réforme devait améliorer l'accès à la justice et accroître la confiance du citoyen dans le système de justice civile[34]. La réforme du code qui a suivi en 2003 a permis de resserrer les délais accordés pour mettre une cause en état, de responsabiliser les parties au litige et d'accroître le rôle du juge dans la gestion de l'instance. Il était reconnu, à cette époque, que les parties et leurs avocats avaient la responsabilité de l'instance et que le rôle et l'implication du juge étaient secondaires. Or, tel que l'expliquera un peu plus tard le ministère de la Justice, « cette manière de percevoir le système de justice occult[e] la responsabilité de l'État dans l'organisation et le maintien du service public qu'est le système de justice, mais aussi la responsabilité des juges dans la gestion des instances et le bon déroulement des affaires »[35].

Avec la nouvelle culture judiciaire, le législateur a permis d'accroître le périmètre d'intervention du juge dans le déroulement de l'instance et a reconnu sa mission additionnelle de conciliation des parties, tout en confirmant le rôle essentiel des avocats dans la constitution et la maîtrise des dossiers. Il a, de même, officiellement consacré la règle de la proportionnalité comme pierre angulaire de la réforme et comme justification à l'autorité et au pouvoir du juge. Dans son Rapport d'évaluation de 2006, le ministère de la Justice indiqua que l'intervention judiciaire n'était nécessaire « que pour s'assurer du bon déroulement de l'instance et du respect du délai de rigueur de 180 jours ou pour accorder une prolongation de délai, le cas échéant »[36]. L'implication du juge était ainsi de mise principalement à défaut d'entente entre les parties ou en cas de mésentente.

Avec le Code de 2016, une nouvelle impulsion est donnée ; le rôle et les pouvoirs du juge sont bonifiés. Le juge a aujourd'hui un devoir de faire respecter le délai d'échéance totale du litige, de mise en état du dossier, tout en s'assurant de faire respecter les objectifs de la justice civile et de sanctionner les mauvais comportements. Précisément, sous l'ancien Code[37], la présentation de la requête introductive d'instance (maintenant une « demande ») devait « constituer une première conférence de gestion pour toutes les demandes [...] [et] permettre une intervention hâtive du tribunal dans le dossier, la présentation [...] des moyens préliminaires, la prononciation de différentes ordonnances du juge pour simplifier et accélérer la procédure [...] [ou encore] l'audition de la demande sur-le-champ ou dans un délai rapproché »[38]. Cette présentation n'avait pas lieu si les parties convenaient d'une entente sur le déroulement de l'instance et la déposaient au dossier de la Cour avant la date de présentation[39].

Sous le nouveau Code, le législateur a voulu abolir cette mesure de « présentation » de la demande. Il l'a remplacée par un examen systématique de tous les protocoles, suivi d'une convocation à une conférence de gestion ou de l'application d'une présomption d'acceptation du protocole[40]. Ainsi, le législateur a modifié le droit en ajoutant

39. a.C.p.c., art. 151.4.
40. C.p.c., art. 148-150. Il faut toutefois souligner qu'en 2006, à l'étape d'évaluation de la réforme intitulée Une nouvelle culture judiciaire, implantée en 2003, il avait une intervention systématique du juge et une appréciation réelle et systématique du processus et des échéances prévues, permettant du coup de mieux cerner les occasions d'intervention du juge en gestion d'instance, tout en compliquant davantage le rôle du magistrat qui doit prendre une décision importante dès le dépôt de la procédure introductive d'instance et du protocole. Ainsi, le juge doit apprécier le respect des principes directeurs de la procédure dans le protocole d'instance, et tout particulièrement, la considération portée par les parties à recourir aux modes privés et la raison pour laquelle les parties choisissent de ne pas procéder par expertise commune[41]. Cela est déjà une grande tâche, compte tenu du peu de familiarité du juge avec le dossier présenté !

Le juge québécois a vu son périmètre d'intervention évoluer et s'étendre au fil des réformes, et ce, conformément aux tendances procédurales à travers le monde. L'intervention du juge se fait alors de manière plus précoce dans le déroulement de l'instance, conformément aux tendances internationales, aux études, aux résultats de projets pilotes[42]. De fait, les règles des cours fédérales américaines, réformées au 1er décembre 2015[43], les règles anglaises ayant suivi la réforme de Lord Woolf[44] et les règles des autres provinces canadiennes[45], pour n'en nommer que quelques-unes, sont fondées sur l'intervention des tribunaux tôt dans l'instance. Ainsi, l'intervention hâtive des juges dans l'instance est une suggestion fréquente et une mesure de réforme primée, dans tous les systèmes de droit, inquisitoires, ou encore adversatifs et contradictoires.

On cite souvent comme justification à l'intervention hâtive les résultats positifs d'une telle mesure sur l'administration à la justice, comme l'ont démontré certains projets pilotes[46]. Le professeur Pierre Noreau, de pair avec l'Observatoire du droit à la Justice, a dirigé un projet pilote dans le District de Longueuil il y a quelques années, lequel a démontré l'effet positif de cette mesure sur le sentiment de justice des parties et des avocats, son effet bénéfique sur la progression du dossier et enfin l'économie des coûts judiciaires réalisée[47]. Or, les études ne sont pas toutes concluantes à cet égard. Dans le Rapport d'évaluation de 2006, on notait que « [l]'intervention hâtive d'un juge est [...] très utile pour contribuer, sinon à un règlement du litige à peu de frais et rapidement, du moins pour limiter le cadre du procès »[48]. Par ailleurs, une étude à grand déploiement menée par le RAND Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice et visant à apprécier les effets du programme américain de judicial management et de modes alternatifs mandaté par les règles du Civil Justice Reform Act 1990[49] dans dix districts visés par le projet pilote conclut que le projet n'avait eu que des effets modestes sur le déroulement de l'instance. Selon l'auteur du rapport, le projet n'avait eu qu'un « little effect on time to disposition, litigation costs, and attorneys' satisfaction and views of the fairness of case management »[50]. De même, la professeure Judith Resnik reste sceptique relativement aux effets bénéfiques d'une intervention hâtive des juges dans son article-phare intitulé « Managerial Judges » :

> no one – neither judges, court administrators, nor legal commentators – has assessed whether relying on trial judges for informal dispute resolution and for case management, either before or after trial, is good, bad, or neutral. Little empirical evidence supports the claim that judicial management "works" either to settle cases or to provide cheaper, quicker, or fairer dispositions.[51]

Il en reste qu'à notre sens, l'intervention hâtive du tribunal permet, avant tout, non seulement de limiter le procès[52], mais aussi de mieux identifier le cadre du litige et ses questions pertinentes, ses forces et ses faiblesses. S'il est nécessaire de permettre, pour un changement aussi fondamental que celui préconisé par la réforme de 2006, une action sur les acteurs eux-mêmes ainsi que sur les incitatifs vécus par eux, il est tout aussi nécessaire de permettre au juge de discuter du dossier avec les parties dans l'espoir d'identifier les questions en litige, la preuve appuyant chacune de ces questions, l'appréciation préliminaire de la suffisance de cette preuve. Ultimement, il sera question d'identifier et de séparer les litiges qui valent la peine d'aller à procès, de ceux qui doivent être réglés. Il s'agira donc de parfaire l'art du diagnostic, soit l'art pour le juge d'apprécier rapidement le type et la forme du litige ainsi que sa potentialité d'apporter une solution juste, équitable et conforme aux principes de justice civile par le biais du procès ou plutôt du règlement à l'amiable.

Au final, bien que les réformes se succèdent et se ressemblent, sans études empiriques plus précises, il sera difficile de conclure d'une manière ou d'une autre relativement aux effets concrets et réels de telles mesures de réforme[53]. Le rôle contemporain du juge québécois reste complexe, car il implique d'être partout à la fois, habile à anticiper, à écouter, à administrer. Ce rôle a trois pôles principaux, que nous aborderons tour à tour dans le présent article : un pôle processuel, un pôle conciliateur et un pôle administratif. Nous proposerons ici que ces pôles ne sont pas parfaitement conciliables, et qu'ils requièrent du juge des efforts quasiment surhumains de telle sorte à le rendre extraordinaire. À notre sens, c'est l'éclosion et la confirmation d'un pôle d'action technologique qui seront le gage de succès de la réforme de 2016. Parlons d'abord des trois pôles d'action du juge et de son rôle multiforme.

3. UN RÔLE MULTIFORME DU JUGE QUÉBÉCOIS ENCADRÉ PAR TROIS PÔLES D'ACTION

Le juge du nouveau Code de procédure civile est extraordinaire. Il est interprète et créateur de droit, responsable de l'évolution du droit positif, impliqué autant dans la sanction des droits que la conciliation des parties, responsable de l'administration et de la gestion de l'instance individuelle, assurant tel un chef d'orchestre le respect de la proportionnalité procédurale et probatoire. Ce nouveau rôle multiforme surprend, car il remet en question les assises et les fonctions classiques des tribunaux québécois. Trois pôles distincts l'encadrent et appuient les fonctions judiciaires.

Le premier pôle est processuel et implique d'apprécier les questions en litige et le conflit, pour ensuite trancher, en tout respect des principes fondamentaux de la procédure[54]. C'est le premier pôle en importance dans la fonction de juger. On peut aussi y référer, d'ailleurs, comme un pôle d'adjudication. Le Comité de révision de la procédure civile a décrit le rôle du juge comme suit :

> La responsabilité première de la juridiction étatique, une composante de l'État, est de rendre jugement en disant le droit au bénéfice des parties et dans l'intérêt général de la société. Il appartient en effet aux tribunaux d'affirmer, promouvoir et interpréter des valeurs collectives dont le droit est l'expression, notamment la primauté du droit, l'égalité juridique, les garanties procédurales, les droits fondamentaux à la liberté, à la sécurité, à la dignité et au respect de la vie privée. Ce faisant, ils rendent un service public, participent à la mission de l'État et contribuent au maintien de la paix sociale.

54. Voir une inspiration : RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE, INSTITUT DES HAUTES ÉTUDES SUR LA JUSTICE, préc., note 26, p. 65.

> Ainsi, en rendant un jugement, le tribunal non seulement règle le conflit en tranchant le litige opposant les parties qui l'en ont saisi, mais également, par la motivation qu'il en fait, dit le droit, en conformité avec les normes établies par la loi et les valeurs véhiculées par les Chartes et en tenant compte de la jurisprudence.[55]

Par le fait même, il incombe au juge de statuer sur tous les faits et toutes les demandes dont il est saisi, tel un chef d'orchestre. L'article 9, alinéa 1 C.p.c. dispose que les tribunaux « ont pour mission de trancher les litiges dont ils sont saisis en conformité avec les règles de droit qui leur sont applicables ». Le juge doit, de plus, statuer lorsque la loi soumet certaines questions à son contrôle. Ce pôle d'adjudication est bel et bien le rôle classique du juge québécois. Comme l'énonçait avec un brin d'humour Victor Hugo : « L'art du juge est de menuiser le code en jurisprudence »[56].

Mais il y a plus. Il n'est pas uniquement question de jurisprudence, il est aussi question d'un pouvoir culturel et social du juge de transmettre des messages aux justiciables[57]. Le pôle processuel implique, pour le juge québécois, une prise de décision relativement à la nécessité ou non de tenir une conférence de gestion, à l'examen du protocole d'instance, à l'occasion de l'exercice du pouvoir de gestion, à la détermination des questions d'expertise et de témoignage et à leur appréciation, parmi tant d'autres occasions de statuer, et ce, toujours en tout respect des principes directeurs du Code[58].

Ensuite, de pair avec ce pôle et les divers pouvoirs y afférents vient celui de sanctionner. La sanction, pour le juge québécois, est celle imposée dans le contexte d'abus de procédure, principalement, ou encore, relativement aux manquements importants dans le déroulement de l'instance[59]. Il faut aussi souligner que le pouvoir de sanctionner devient plus important, sous le nouveau Code, par le biais de l'article 342 C.p.c. Cet article permet au juge de sanctionner les manquements importants constatés dans le déroulement de l'instance en ordonnant à l'une des parties, après les avoir entendues, « à titre de frais de justice, de verser à une autre partie, selon ce qu'il estime juste et raisonnable, une compensation pour le paiement des honoraires professionnels de son avocat ou, si cette autre partie n'est pas représentée par avocat, une compensation pour le temps consacré à l'affaire et le travail effectué ».

Le second pôle est le pôle conciliateur, lequel est également codifié à l'article 9, alinéa 2 C.p.c. L'article 4.3 a.C.p.c. précisait déjà qu'il entrait dans la mission du juge de favoriser la conciliation des parties. Le législateur a, de plus, introduit la procédure de conférence de règlement à l'amiable dès la réforme de 2002, aux articles 151.14 à 151.23 a.C.p.c., laquelle permet aux personnes et aux entreprises impliquées dans une cause civile de la régler, à n'importe quelle étape de l'instance, sans avoir à tenir un procès. En fait, ces articles permettent au juge en chef, à la demande des parties, de désigner un juge pour présider une conférence de règlement à l'amiable dont le but est d'aider les parties à communiquer, à négocier, à identifier leurs intérêts, à évaluer leurs positions et à explorer des solutions mutuellement satisfaisantes. Avec le nouveau Code, la conciliation est possible même sans autorisation des parties, « si les circonstances s'y prêtent »[60]. Somme toute, le pôle conciliateur s'exerce à divers stades des procédures, qu'il s'agisse de l'examen du protocole et de la conférence de gestion, s'il y a lieu, ou encore, du pouvoir continuel des tribunaux de considérer la proportionnalité probatoire et processuelle, qui implique souvent des efforts ou suggestions de conciliation, dans un souci d'efficience et d'économie.

La conciliation s'intègre et s'interprète alors dans la nouvelle culture de priorisation des modes privés de prévention et de règlement des différends. Servira-t-elle toutefois à améliorer l'accès à la justice ? À notre avis, devant les réticences ouvertement communiquées des membres du Barreau à l'égard de la réforme et du principe de priorisation des modes privés, une fausse harmonie semble avoir été créée entre des parties véritablement (ou secrètement) opposées au règlement[61]. De plus, la priorisation des modes privés et l'encouragement des parties à régler (sinon la réelle pression exercée sur elles) fait peut-être fausse route en laissant présumer que la solution la plus juste est celle négociée, au détriment de l'adjudication, au cœur du système de justice civile traditionnel[62]. En fin de compte, sans études empiriques plus poussées permettant de déterminer si la croissance des modes privés permet un meilleur accès aux tribunaux judiciaires, la question reste théorique, mais réelle.

60. Ibid., art. 9, al. 2.

61. Selon Hazel GENN, « cases are more likely to settle at mediation if the parties enter the process voluntarily rather than being pressured into the process and increased pressure to mediate depresses settlement rates. Thus one broad conclusion of evaluation research has been that facilitation and encouragement together with selective and appropriate pressure are likely to be more effective and possibly efficient in producing settlements than blanket coercion to mediate ».

Le troisième pôle est le pôle gestionnaire. Tel que le dispose le deuxième alinéa de l'article 9 C.p.c., le juge aura pour mission de favoriser la conciliation des parties, ainsi que de s'assurer de la saine gestion de l'instance. Le juge québécois envisagé par le législateur sous le nouveau Code examine systématiquement un protocole de l'instance conclu par les parties qui suppose un haut degré de précision sur le déroulement anticipé de l'affaire, et décide de tenir – ou non – une conférence de gestion, à la suite de cet examen[63]. Dès les premiers moments, le juge apprécie la nature du litige ainsi que la coopération des parties et l'accomplissement de leur devoir de considérer le recours à un mode privé de règlement. Si la conférence de gestion est tenue, une série de mesures appropriées peut être prise et des engagements peuvent être requis des parties pour assurer la poursuite de l'instance ou assujettir les parties à certaines conditions[64]. Si aucune conférence n'est tenue, les parties présument que l'instance est bien gérée et semble proportionnée. Ensuite, tout au long de l'instance, la gestion d'instance s'effectue par le biais des échanges tenus entre le juge et les avocats, parfois même avec les parties, dans le but d'assurer le bon déroulement de l'instance et l'application du principe de proportionnalité. Ainsi, il pourra s'agir de conférences de gestion, certes, mais aussi des échanges et audiences tenus au tribunal, notamment pour régler des questions d'expertises, d'objections ou de témoignages. Au cours de ces échanges, le juge sera adjudicateur, souvent conciliateur aussi, favorisant le règlement du litige et espérant désamorcer le différend.

S'agit-il bien sous le nouveau Code de la même fonction de saine gestion qui était envisagée sous l'ancien ? Selon nous, la fonction de gestion d'instance a évolué vers une fonction d'administration active de l'instance. Impliqué dans les coulisses du litige, dans le déroulement de l'instance et avant le procès, guidé dans ses décisions par le principe de proportionnalité, le juge québécois favorise le règlement et incite à la négociation et à la médiation de telle sorte à jouer un rôle critique d'influence sur le cours et l'aboutissement des litiges[65]. En fait, ce rôle tout à fait extraordinaire conduit à deux paradoxes dont nous traitons ci-après.

4. LES PARADOXES ASSOCIÉS AU RÔLE DU JUGE DANS UN SYSTÈME DE JUSTICE CIVILE QUÉBÉCOIS HYBRIDE

Si la justice est un bien public et l'accès à la justice un droit, il faut que tous puissent y avoir accès. La « crise » du système de justice civile québécois peut-elle être résolue par le biais de la seule réforme des règles du Code de procédure civile ? Si la question est légitime, la réponse, elle, est difficile. Cette crise annoncée par tous, mais ancienne comme le monde n'est-elle pas un faux prétexte pour poursuivre la réflexion sur la justice civile[66] ? Pourquoi parler encore et toujours d'un accès lent, coûteux et exclusif aux tribunaux alors que ces problèmes perdurent depuis des siècles sans toutefois trouver de solutions ? Comment le juge participe-t-il à la réforme ? Notre juge traditionnellement adversatif et contradictoire, tel que la common law lui a imposé de l'être, œuvre dans un monde polarisé. Il se retrouve aujourd'hui poussé à intervenir plus activement dans l'instance, à administrer, adjudiquer et concilier, à écouter et à statuer, à trancher... en toute neutralité. En fin de compte, on demande au juge d'être autre chose et beaucoup plus qu'un adjudicateur neutre et impartial, recherchant la vérité dans ce qui émane des parties devant lui ou elle.

La justice aujourd'hui n'est plus un combat ; elle est coopérative, collaborative, participative. Comme l'énonçait si remarquablement Abraham Lincoln dans l'un de ses discours, « [d]iscourage litigation. Persuade your neighbors to compromise whenever you can. Point out to them how the nominal winner is often a real loser – in fees, expenses, and waste of time. As a peacemaker the lawyer has a superior opportunity of being a good man »[67]. Cette leçon de Lincoln reflète bien la nature de la réforme de 2016.

Le système de justice québécois est-il alors devenu inquisitoire ? Selon Jolowicz, le système adversatif a deux caractéristiques principales : 1) il donne le pouvoir aux parties de définir l'objet de leur litige et 2) s'assure que ces mêmes parties puissent décider de l'information dont le juge tiendra compte dans sa prise de décision[68]. Or, le nouveau Code, même s'il priorise dorénavant la saine gestion de l'instance par le juge sur la maîtrise du dossier par les parties[69], ne remet pas complètement en cause ces deux caractéristiques fondamentales du système adversatif. Ce sont les parties qui, encore aujourd'hui, doivent décider de la manière de présenter leur dossier, de leurs procédures et de leurs preuves. Ce sont les parties qui gardent le monopole de l'angle et du contenu stratégique de leur dossier devant le tribunal. Selon nous, le système québécois n'est donc ni parfaitement adversatif ni parfaitement inquisitoire[70]. Il est mixte dans sa preuve et sa procédure[71], hybride dans sa structure et le rôle de ses juges.

Ainsi, le système de justice québécois est affecté d'un paradoxe double, révélateur de conflits dans la fonction de juger : 1) celui du juge adjudicateur dont l'autorité est aujourd'hui conditionnée à des préoccupations administratives, et 2) celui du juge adjudicateur neutre et impartial ayant comme mission d'agir comme facilitateur de règlements et comme conciliateur occasionnel des parties. Il est vrai que l'autorité dite « morale » du juge est fondée en grande partie sur le statut de sa fonction de juge et sur les attributs d'indépendance et d'impartialité qui lui sont associés[72]. Comment alors concilier le désir et la nécessité de trancher et d'adjudiquer devant l'immense disproportion émanant d'un dossier, par exemple, ou devant l'émergence d'un terrain éventuel d'entente entre les parties ?

Gagnon*, Montréal, Éditions Yvon Blais, 2007, p. 25, 42.

Les difficultés associées au deuxième paradoxe furent décrites par le professeur Ferland comme suit :

> Les différences existant entre le procès et la conciliation sont importantes et le rôle du juge, immanquablement, s'en trouve bouleversé. Toutefois, dans un cas comme dans l'autre, l'indépendance de l'institution judiciaire et l'impartialité du juge sont des exigences fondamentales. Ces deux valeurs, conjuguées avec les connaissances approfondies du droit et des conflits, ainsi que la mission traditionnelle de disposer des litiges et de rendre justice, sont les principales raisons qui procurent au juge conciliateur une grande autorité morale, voire la crédibilité nécessaire pour agir à ce titre.[73]

À notre sens, le juge se doit de préserver l'objectif d'adjudication comme étant prioritaire. L'article 9 C.p.c. dispose que la mission des tribunaux est de trancher les litiges dont ils sont saisis, selon le droit applicable. Ensuite, vient la mission de statuer, dans les matières contentieuses et non contentieuses. Ainsi, la fonction première du juge reste celle de trancher les litiges. Et c'est dans le cadre de ce rôle et ce pouvoir qu'il doit exercer son pouvoir de diagnostic. Le juge doit pouvoir rapidement identifier les litiges qui devraient être réglés à l'amiable de ceux qui n'ont de solution que celle adjudiquée au procès. Il s'agit donc d'un système dans lequel le juge diagnostique le litige en vertu d'une liste de facteurs fondés sur les principes de justice civile, d'une liste annoncée clairement et connue de tous, par un processus qui fait l'assentiment des parties et évite l'arbitraire. À cet égard, comme l'indique si habilement Antoine Garapon, l'autorité du juge doit recevoir l'appui des autres acteurs ; elle doit être définie et encadrée le plus possible à la loi pour être « profondément démocratique »[74].

5. CONCLUSION : LE PÔLE TECHNOLOGIQUE EXERCÉ PAR LE JUGE EXTRAORDINAIRE

On peut se demander comment le juge québécois pourra, de manière réaliste, devenir et rester extraordinaire devant l'ampleur de la tâche annoncée par le Code de 2016. Comment réussir à atteindre les objectifs que le législateur a énoncés ? Dans sa caisse à outils, le juge extraordinaire aura, d'abord et toujours, un principe fondateur de proportionnalité lui permettant d'affirmer quasiment tous azimuts sa préoccupation pour la proportionnalité, sa proportiomanie ! Le principe de proportionnalité fascine, car il sert de justification fondamentale et populaire aux décisions des tribunaux québécois et parce que, devenu universel, il reste imparfaitement défini[75]. Il obsède les tribunaux qui peinent toutefois à l'appliquer de manière uniforme. Utilisée à toutes les sauces, la proportionnalité sert à limiter ou à permettre, selon le cas, les preuves et les procédures. Dans la caisse à outils se trouvent aussi la loi et la conscience du juge, bien sûr, pour faire un clin d'œil à Balzac, cité en exergue au présent article. La conscience du juge lui permet d'agir en toute équité, et ce, malgré la confusion et les conflits inhérents à son rôle multiforme.

Le juge extraordinaire devra au moins savoir agir avec l'assentiment des parties, de manière non arbitraire, en sachant sélectionner et diagnostiquer les dossiers qui requerront et recevront une attention plus particulière de sa part ; ceux qui lanceront des signaux invisibles de disproportion. Ce diagnostic judiciaire sera question de flair informé et justifié, somme toute, pour éviter que le justiciable (ou son procureur) ne préfère éviter le forum de justice civile public traditionnel. Ce risque d'évitement des tribunaux demeure réel et présent avec l'avènement du nouveau Code, la puissance du juge pouvant avoir l'effet d'effrayer les justiciables. Ensuite, il aurait été souhaitable qu'un seul et même juge puisse évaluer le protocole d'instance et suivre le dossier jusqu'à son procès, pour une meilleure compréhension et un suivi plus efficace du dossier. La réforme de 2016 n'a pas retenu cette possibilité, car elle ne peut être concrétisée dans l'état actuel des ressources administratives des tribunaux québécois.

Il en reste que, de pair avec le nouveau principe de priorisation des modes technologiques de l'article 26 C.p.c., vient un pôle technologique dans l'exercice du rôle et des pouvoirs du juge québécois. Ce pôle requiert que les tribunaux puissent encourager les divers intervenants à rechercher l'utilisation des modes technologiques et qu'ils mettent de côté la prudence préconisée par le Rapport d'évaluation de 2006[76] qui n'est tout simplement plus de mise. C'est par ce pôle technologique que le juge réussira à mieux gérer l'instance, en effectuant notamment un tri informatisé des protocoles d'instance, dans certains cas[77]. C'est aussi en accueillant les technologies que les tribunaux pourront permettre plus ouvertement et systématiquement la preuve technologique, comme nous le verrons peut-être dans la pratique sous le nouveau Code ! On pourrait alors se laisser aller à suggérer que le pôle technologique puisse être le gage de succès de la réforme de 2016.

Creating a System for All Parents: Rethinking Procedural and Evidentiary Rules in Proceedings with Self-Represented Litigants

Through qualitative interviews undertaken with ten judges at the Superior Court of Québec, this study considers the procedural and evidentiary challenges faced by self-represented litigants in family law matters. Subsequently, this paper offers solutions to the problems identified. The goal of this paper is to provide legal participants with concrete techniques to facilitate proceedings with SRLs that uphold their duty of impartiality and duty of assistance. While this article will likely be useful for judges who engage with SRLs daily, it will also be of interest to those working on issues relating to access to justice, SRLs, as well as procedural and evidentiary law reform. This paper urges its readers to think critically about our legal system. Who has our legal system been created for, yet who must actually use it?

Grâce à des d'entrevues qualitatives menées auprès de dix juges de la Cour supérieure du Québec, nous examinons dans le présent article les défis en matière de procédure et de preuve auxquels font face les justiciables qui ne sont pas représentés par un avocat dans les affaires de droit de la famille. Ensuite, nous proposons des solutions aux problèmes identifiés. L'objectif de cet article est de fournir aux intervenants juridiques des techniques concrètes pour faciliter les procédures avec les justiciables sans avocat tout en respectant leur devoir d'impartialité et leur devoir d'assistance. Bien que cet article soit susceptible d'être utile aux juges qui travaillent quotidiennement avec des justiciables non représentés par un avocat, il intéressera également ceux qui travaillent sur des questions liées à l'accès à la justice, aux justiciables sans avocat, ainsi qu'à la réforme du droit en matière de procédure et de preuve. Dans l'article, nous incitons les lecteurs à réfléchir de manière critique à notre système juridique. Pour qui notre système juridique a-t-il été créé, et qui doit réellement l'utiliser?

Introduction

It is no secret that our justice system is failing many of the people it purports to serve. Former Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin has been regularly cited for asserting that our "legal systems everywhere are experiencing an access to justice crisis that requires innovative solutions."[1] In particular, Self-Represented Litigants (SRLs) in family law matters are among those struggling, as they face significant procedural and evidentiary challenges in getting their cases through our legal system. Student-run legal clinics, pro bono offices, and numerous community programs work tirelessly to help Self Represented Litigants navigate complex legal proceedings. These efforts are extremely important. However, as a public service, it is time the legal system adapts to better reflect and serve its clientele, rather than the other way around.

The access to justice crisis greatly affects Canadian family matters.[2] The traditionally lawyer-dominated courtroom is being replaced by many litigants with little or no legal training. Canada's changing legal landscape requires all actors within the system to rethink their role and adapt, and the judiciary is no exception. In fact, the growing presence of SRLs has made the role of the judge more difficult and important. Judges must uphold impartiality, a fundamental tenet of our judicial system, while simultaneously fulfilling their duty of assistance to SRLs. Although procedural and evidentiary rules serve as a framework for judges, lawyers, and court staff, they often create substantial burdens on SRLs seeking justice.[3]

This article is based on qualitative interviews I conducted with ten judges at the Superior Court of Québec during the Fall of 2018.[4] It builds on previous scholarship that seeks to provide judges with concrete techniques to facilitate proceedings with SRLs while upholding their duty of impartiality and duty of assistance.[5] While this article will be useful for judges who engage with SRLs daily, it will also be of interest to those working on issues relating to access to justice, SRLs, and procedural and evidentiary law reform. It is organized into four parts. Part I describes the research methodology utilized. Part II provides an overview of self-representation in Canadian family law matters. Part III considers the role of the judge in administering justice in proceedings involving SRLs in family law. It explores how judges balance judicial ethics as well as the duty of assistance in these proceedings. Part IV identifies salient procedural and evidentiary challenges faced by SRLs in family law proceedings. Subsequently, it provides judges with practical solutions to address these problems. The solutions I propose are informed by the interviews I conducted with judges, as well as current literature and jurisprudence. In February 2020, I presented these solutions at a judicial conference to 35 members of the judiciary of the Superior Court of Québec in Montreal.

Since SRLs turn to the judge before them for guidance, how judges conduct proceedings is crucial. The degree of assistance provided by the judge and the manner in which this assistance is delivered can influence the outcome of an SRL's case and, more importantly, their belief in having accessed meaningful justice. Ultimately, promoting access to justice for SRLs will require a momentous cultural shift, for which this paper is but one effort. Roderick A Macdonald insisted that "the law requires citizens to come to it, not the reverse."[6] This paper urges its readers to change the reality described by Macdonald by creating a legal system that works for all, including SRLs in family law matters.

I. Research Methodology

The findings of this study are based on data I compiled through qualitative interviews with 10 judges who regularly hear family law cases in the Montreal Division of the Superior Court of Québec.[7] As the court of original general jurisdiction, the Superior Court of Québec has jurisdiction

Courts have also recognized that judges owe SRLs a duty of assistance. in family law matters,[8] with the exception of adoption, which is the jurisdiction of the Court of Québec.[9] Unlike in other jurisdictions, Quebec does not have designated family law courts. However, in Montreal and Quebec City, legal matters are divided between internal administrative entities known as chambers, one of these being the Family Chamber.[10] The Family Chamber deals with cases involving applications for divorce, annulment of marriage, separation from bed and board and dissolution of civil unions. It also handles cases related to child support, the exercise of parental authority (custody and access rights), and applications concerning civil status.[11]

The Montréal Division of the Superior Court of Québec is served by 102 regular judges, 89 of which are assigned to the district Montreal.[12] While some judges of the Superior Court in Québec may sit exclusively in the Family Chamber, judges are not officially appointed to specific chambers. In fact, some judges may sit in a variety of chambers and hear different types of legal matters.[13] However, six of the ten judges I interviewed stated that they heard exclusively family law matters.[14]

Participants of this study were recruited through the Associate Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Québec. I contacted the Associate Chief Justice by e-mail explaining the objectives of my research and the interview process I intended to utilize. The Associate Chief Justice shared my research proposal and interview questions by e-mail to judges at the Superior Court of Québec in the Division of Montreal. This Division was chosen because it is the biggest Division in the Superior Court of Québec in terms of number of judges and case load.[15] Participation in this study was voluntary; judges decided themselves whether they would participate. The ten participants ranged in their experience as a judge from one year to 15 years on the bench. Six had worked in family law prior to being appointed a judge. Nine of the participants identified as women and nine identified as white.

The data collection process consisted of semi-structured interviews conducted from October through December 2018. Each interview was conducted by phone or in-person and lasted between forty minutes and one hour and a half. Interviews were conducted in English or French according to the wishes of the participants. Participants were asked approximately twelve open-ended questions disclosed to them prior to the interview.[16] The first set of questions focused on how judges interact when one or more of the litigants are self-represented. Participants were asked about the degree to which they assist SRLs and the techniques they employ to facilitate proceedings. The second group of questions explored the perceptions of judges regarding the extent to which they believe SRLs access justice, if they had concerns, and what solutions they would suggest. While the interviews were based on the questions I prepared, participants were free to discuss any topic related to SRLs they found relevant or important. With the consent of each participant, each interview was audio-recorded and subsequently transcribed verbatim.

This study is constrained by certain methodological limitations. First, it would have been beneficial to interview a greater number of judges within the chosen population. Unfortunately, this was limited by judges' willingness to participate, as well as my own time and resources.[17] The study's sample size was small and not randomly selected; however, the qualitative interviews palliated the size by providing in-depth and detailed data into the everyday interactions of seasoned judges and SRLs. Further, at around the sixth interview I felt that many of the judges' answers were becoming repetitive. Despite my small sample size, the fact that my final interviews yielded little new information made me more confident in the value and reliability of the data I collected.

Second, the empirical research of this study is limited to the perspectives of judges in Montreal and its surrounding areas. Given that the majority of participants were white women in the judiciary, certain gender, racial and socio-economic biases may have influenced how participants understand the phenomenon of self-representation as well as how they perceive cases involving SRLs and SRLs themselves. While it was beyond the scope of this particular research, the experiences of SRLs are fundamental to efforts

17. While I anticipated that some judges were not willing to participate in the study, some may have also been worried about judicial impartiality and confidentiality. I make that conclusion based on the fact that eight of the ten judges asked numerous questions prior to the interview commencing about how I planned on keeping their participation and interviews confidential.

seeking to transform the legal process.[18] Future research should consider whether, from the perspectives of SRLs, the solutions offered in this paper do in fact improve access to justice.

II. Self-representation in Canadian family law cases

The judges I interviewed were unable to identify a precise number of SRLs that come before the courts. Nonetheless, many estimated that approximately 40 per cent of family law cases involve at least one SRL.[19] This percentage reflects current estimates found in the literature.[20] However, in Ontario, Macfarlane states that this number is likely an underestimation as many commence proceedings with legal representation, yet will discontinue to retain these services due to financial ressources.[21] Despite the lack of accurate data, all judges interviewed affirmed that SRLs are most prevalent in family law cases and their numbers are steadily rising.

This paper will not recap the literature which has extensively documented the demographics of SRLs and their reasons for self-representing.[22] Numerous studies have also identified the challenges faced by SRLs in accessing our legal system and presenting their case in court.[23] However, one recurring theme throughout these studies is that SRLs struggle to present their case in court due to the complexity and inaccessibility of procedural and evidentiary rules.[24] The National Self-Represented Litigants Project's 2020 study quoted SRLs who describe this struggle.[25] One SRL insisted, "I have not had trouble with legal arguments, I have had problems with process and procedures which are either obscure or informal which has left me at a disadvantage."[26] Another SRL explained, "[D]uring that process, I realized that what was holding me back was knowledge of process. I know my case, but I don't know how to counter the defendant's legal maneuvering in court."[27]

The majority of judges interviewed echoed these concerns, stating that procedural and evidentiary law remain the biggest obstacles for SRLs in family law cases. Generally, family law proceedings involving SRLs are not substantively complex. In referring to the sharing of assets within the family patrimony, one judge stated that SRLs usually grasp the substantive law applicable to their case once it has been explained: "It is rare that unrepresented parties have a lot of property to share. Often, parties with a lot to share can afford legal representation."[28] While substantive law is often inaccessible for those without legal education, one judge emphasized that SRLs are increasingly more knowledgeable about it. The judge indicated that often SRLs will have referred to online resources, such as Éducaloi,[29] prior to their proceedings. Thus, judges interviewed explained that most court time is dedicated to explaining procedural and evidentiary rules as opposed to substantive law.[30] For SRLs, these rules remain "a sea of legal unknowns."[31]

An ongoing discussion about best practices surrounding judicial engagement is required given the growing number of SRLs in family law proceedings and the issues at the heart of these cases. This discussion must consider dismantling procedural and evidentiary obstacles faced by SRLs to create more accessible courtrooms for all. Hence, this study builds on previous research that seeks to dismantle these barriers.[32] It provides judges with concrete techniques to address procedural and evidentiary issues faced by SRLs in family law proceedings. The solutions I propose are neither exhaustive nor one-size-fits-all. Further research is needed to offer solutions that address systemic barriers faced by various demographics of SRLs.[33] Nonetheless, these solutions are promising contributions which can make our courtrooms more accessible for many.

III. The role of the judge

This section begins by discussing judicial ethics, notably impartiality, fairness, and equality. Next, it considers the duty of assistance. Throughout, the views of judges interviewed are considered alongside current literature. I conclude this section by advocating for a shift in how the legal community has traditionally understood balancing the duty of impartiality and assistance to SRLs. I call for a modification of procedural and evidentiary rules in family law proceedings with SRLs when appropriate.

1. Impartiality, equality, and fairness

The Canadian judiciary is guided by the 2004 Ethical Principles for Judges.[34] These principles were recently revised in June 2021 and will be referred to throughout this paper.[35]

The Ethical Principles include the principles of impartiality, equality, and fairness.[36] The importance of these principles cannot be overstated; they are vital to the proper functioning of our courts and to ensuring that those who utilize them, regardless of who they are, will be able to access the legal system and feel heard. Despite their important presence in the legal system, SRLs were not mentioned once within the 2004 Ethical Principles. The 2004 Ethical Principles seemed to presume that all cases involve clients represented by legal counsel.[37] I found this particularly

33. Studies have shown that various social structures, such as an individual's gender, ethnicity, race, immigration status, Indigeneity, education, language, disability, age, and location, compound to mold the experiences of SRLs. See e.g. Fragomeni, Scarrow & Macfarlane, supra note 3; Sara Sternberg Greene, "Race, Class, and Access to Civil Justice" (2016) 101:4 Iowa L Rev 1263; Rebecca L Sandefur, "Access to Civil Justice and Race, Class, and Gender Inequality" (2008) 34 Annual Rev Sociology 339; Julie Macfarlane & Sandra Shushani, "When Judges See SRLs, Do They See Gender? 34. "Ethical Principles for Judges" (2004), online (pdf): Canadian Judicial Council <cjc-ccm.ca/sites/default/files/documents/2019/news_pub_judicialconduct_Principles_en.pdf> [perma.cc/5ZE3-8NR7].

35. "Ethical Principles for Judges" (2021), online (pdf): Canadian Judicial Council <cjc-ccm.ca/sites/default/files/documents/2021/CJC_20-301_Ethical-Principles_Bilingual%20FINAL.pdf> [perma.cc/8B7D-V8ZV] [CJC, "Ethical Principles 2021"].

36. Ibid. Impartiality is a fundamental precept guaranteeing the legitimacy of our legal system. Judges are not only required to be impartial, but equally emanate the appearance of impartiality. Furthermore, judges must ensure that proceedings are conducted in a manner that upholds equality according to the law. Finally, notions of impartiality and equality are deeply intertwined in a judge's responsibility to assure fair proceedings for all parties. The judge must not only act fairly, but appear to be acting fairly.

concerning given that principles of impartiality and fairness should be at the forefront of the minds of the judiciary when they are faced with cases involving SRLs. Judges interviewed explained that legal representation is an additional safeguard of judicial impartiality, as the judge can rely on counsel to assist their client. However, judges explained that impartiality becomes more vulnerable to erosion when a judge is tasked with assisting a SRL.[38] Thankfully, as will be later discussed, the revised 2021 Ethical Principles now make reference to SRLs.

The situation in Quebec mirrors that of other Canadian jurisdictions: judges worry about maintaining impartiality during proceedings for both SRLs and opposing represented parties.[39] Judges interviewed admitted heightened concerns when one party is represented and the other is not.[40] One judge stated, "there is a risk of being told that we lack impartiality when we have a self-represented party before us. We receive many complaints. Either we helped too much or not enough. It is very difficult."[41] However, interviews showed that maintaining impartiality during a proceeding is easier when both parties are self-represented. Two SRLs are perceived by judges as generally being on equal playing fields. However, judges explained that a case involving two SRLs requires much more time and work on behalf of the judge; one judge stated, "It's like preparing two files, it's too much work. At least when I have a lawyer, he manages his client."[42]

These findings suggest that dynamics and communications between the judiciary and litigants may differ based on the number of SRLs involved in the proceeding. Specifically, judges interviewed were more concerned about adequately balancing their duty of impartiality and assistance in proceedings involving one SRL and one person represented by counsel.

2. The duty of assistance

Jurisprudence has increasingly recognized that judges "should provide some assistance" to SRLs to ensure fair and equal proceedings.[43] In 2006, the Canadian Judicial Council (CJC) issued the Statement of Principles on Self-Represented Litigants and Accused Persons (Principles on SRLs). The Principles on SRLs highlight the "special challenges" faced by SRLs and list obligations of all actors within the legal system to ensure access to justice and equal treatment of all litigants.[44] Judges may modify or supplement court procedures when necessary, as "procedural and evidentiary rules [should not be] used to unjustly hinder the legal interests of self-represented persons."[45]

Over ten years later, the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) endorsed the Principles on SRLs in Pintea v Johns.[46] Mr. Pintea had commenced an action to recover damages from a motor vehicle accident. He later became an SRL and failed to notify the court and the defendants of his change of address. Consequently, he did not attend case management meetings as he had never received the notices. The trial judge found Mr. Pintea in contempt of court, struck his claim, and awarded the defendants over $80,000 in costs. The Court of Appeal upheld the lower court decision, which was later appealed to the SCC.[47] In a mere five paragraphs, the SCC found that Mr. Pintea could not be held in contempt of court as he was unaware of the court orders. The SCC reinstated his action, removed the cost award, and endorsed the Principles on SRLs.[48] The SCC's endorsement of the Principles on SRLs is a significant milestone. However, a report released by the NSRLP has found that while lower courts are increasingly referencing the Principles on SRLs, there continues to be much variation in how judges fulfill their duty of assistance.[49]

Similar trends were observed during my interviews. All judges interviewed acknowledged their duty to assist SRLs. One judge insisted, "I owe a different duty to an unrepresented party, a duty which is minute when a person is represented by a lawyer. However, I'm not their lawyer."[50] While judges recognized their duty to assist SRLs, how they translated this assistance in the courtroom varied. Some judges took a broader approach to assisting SRLs and were able to identify specific techniques they use to facilitate courtroom interactions.[51] Others were unable to provide specific practices they employ, but insisted they take a different approach to dealing with SRLs.[52] Some insisted that nothing changes with respect to their interactions in the courtroom.[53]

In fact, the degree to which procedural and evidentiary rules are enforced in proceedings involving SRLs provides a useful example to demonstrate the differing degrees to which judges assist SRLs.[54] Generally, the level of enforcement can be categorized into two views. The first view is premised on a fairly strict application of procedure. Accordingly, these judges believed, "the procedure is what it is; it applies to everyone."[55]

55. Interview, Judge 1, 5 November 2018. This quotation was translated by the author. The original reads: "la procédure est telle quelle. La procédure s'applique à tous. Rien ne change dans la procédure."

This approach suggests a mechanical, copy-and-paste application of procedure across all cases regardless of the needs of the person before the court. Article 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure (CCP) equally seems to support a strict application of procedure to all persons: "Natural persons may self-represent before the courts, but must comply with the procedure established by this Code and the regulations under this Code."[56] In fact, one judge emphasized that they read and reiterate this article to all SRLs that come before them that choose to proceed without a lawyer.[57]

The alternative view held by other interviewees was that procedure should be adaptable. These judges emphasized the need to simplify procedure and make accommodations based on the needs of the parties. One judge stated it is their duty to make proceedings as simple as possible, which often involves curtailing procedure. The adaptation of procedure was intimately linked to their understanding of their role as a judge and more importantly as a "public servant."[58] This camp of judges emphasized their duty to assist SRLs by modifying procedural and evidentiary rules when required. They also believed that procedural and evidentiary rules serve as frameworks, allowing all parties to a proceeding to understand their rights and obligations therein. However, they cannot be so heavily enforced that they impede a party from having their case heard. The CCP also attempts to create this balance. While article 23 CCP posits that procedure applies to everyone, it must be balanced by article 25 CCP, which states, "The rules of this Code are designed to facilitate the resolution of disputes and to bring out the substantive law and ensure that it is carried out."[59]

Throughout the interviews, it became apparent that not all judges share the same vision of how the duty of assistance should be carried out in the courtroom. Some believed assisting SRLs requires changing their usual mode of operation, others did not. Cynthia Gray has noted that "[t]rial courts possess 'a discretionary range of control over parties and proceedings' that allows reasonable accommodations to self-represented litigants."[60] The key point is that this control is discretionary, implying that the judiciary is not obliged to use it. In fact, my research has shown that a lack of concrete guidelines for the duty of assistance can lead to inconsistent assistance among judges and throughout cases. According to Nicholas Bala, balancing the rights of SRLs and judicial ethics "is one of the hardest things that we now expect judges to do."[61] However, SRLs have repeatedly voiced that our current way of operating disadvantages them in court.[62] As the legal landscape changes, how judges interact with SRLs needs to be re-examined. These traditional passive notions of impartiality create barriers to justice for SRLs and call for more active approaches.

3. A way forward: rethinking judicial ethics and the needs of SRLs

Within the adversarial system, maintaining impartiality while simultaneously assisting SRLs is a challenging task the judiciary must grapple with. When asked if they believe SRLs are disadvantaged in the courtroom, some judges replied that one's status as an SRL does not impact the outcome of the case: "In judging the merits of disputes, we make decisions based on the facts and the law. The main issue remains the same."[63] And yet, these same judges hesitated when providing a response and many others admitted it was a difficult question to answer.

While the substantive law applicable to one's case does not change based on legal representation or lack thereof, in many cases "an imbalance exists between the parties, and judges do not have a magic wand."[64] According to one judge, "though we can provide some information on how this works, we cannot make objections or present evidence for them. Of course, in some cases, self-represented parties would have benefited from legal advice."[65] Another judge acknowledged: "It's very possible. There are numerous subtle factors that can impact a case. It can simply come down to how SRLs present themselves. Lawyers often polish their clients, and you have to appreciate that many of these self-represented litigants have not been polished."[66] While some judges interviewed may not believe that a litigant's status as an SRL impacts their final decision, Macfarlane suggests that many SRLs do not share these sentiments.[67]

The duty of assistance to SRLs seems often limited by judicial impartiality. For some judges, balancing these objectives is perceived as a constant contention between "competing imperatives."[68] However, I argue that these important objectives do not need to be perceived as zero-sum; it is possible to safeguard the fundamental ethical pillars of our judicial system while ensuring that SRLs are not disadvantaged by their lack of legal representation.[69] Michelle Flaherty explains that our understanding of impartiality is firmly rooted in a time and courtroom where most benefited from legal representation and passive adjudication was the norm:

> However, as self-representation becomes the new norm, the ongoing validity of this approach is called into question. To put it differently: if it is unfair to expect self-represented litigants to navigate the hearing process without adjudicative assistance and direction, it is also unfair to insist on a vision of impartiality that prevents adjudicators from intervening with direction or assistance.[70]

It is time to divorce our understanding of impartiality from passivity and encourage judges to undertake more active adjudication which modifies rules of procedure and evidence when appropriate.[71] Gray argues that active adjudication remains consistent with the role of the judge:

> The adversary system is not ensconced in the code of judicial conduct, nor is the primary purpose of the code to protect the formalities of the adversary system. While judges may be more comfortable in the role reflected in the rare situation in which all parties are represented by competent, diligent counsel, their discomfort in a more involved role does not necessarily suggest the role reflects partiality, and the traditional role of the judge is in fact as a guiding force at a trial, not just a ceremonial presence or silent monitor presiding over rituals understandable only by the initiated.[72]

The solutions I propose in this article align with the role of the judge and uphold important ethical principles, notably impartiality. They encourage judges to modify some of their in-court practices to address the real and diverse challenges faced by so many accessing our family court system. Flaherty explains, the judicial "model has begun to shift from a more traditional, passive approach to one in which decision-makers more actively adjudicate cases and direct the course of proceedings."[73] The revised 2021 Ethical Principles are an example of this.[74] As previously mentioned, the 2004 Ethical Principles made no reference to SRLs. Thankfully, in 2019 the CJC recognized this blind spot and asked the Judicial Independence Committee to begin consultations to update the Ethical Principles.[75] The new principles were released in June 2021 and now make reference to SRLs a handful of times, a welcome change from the previous edition. More importantly, the new principles call on the judiciary to re-evaluate their ethical duties: "Today, judges' work includes case management, settlement conferences, judicial mediation and frequent interaction with self-represented litigants. These responsibilities invite further consideration with respect to ethical guidance."[76]

One further addition to the revised Ethical Principles deserves consideration. Principle 2 on Integrity and Respect now includes a comment section entitled "Access to Justice and Self-Represented Litigants." Comment 2.D.2 reads:

> Passive neutrality and treating everyone in the same manner may not always be appropriate. Parties often appear before the court as self-represented litigants. Judges should provide information and reasonable assistance, proactively where appropriate, on procedural and evidentiary rules, while being alert not to compromise judicial impartiality and the fairness of the proceeding.[77]

The CJC's assertion that treating everyone equally does not necessarily lead to a fair hearing is a transformative remark. In fact, the CJC seems to be encouraging judges to assist SRLs by modifying procedural and evidentiary rules when necessary.[78] It is not possible to treat every litigant absolutely the same, nor is it equal to uphold a passive principle of impartiality; doing so may actually undermine a fair hearing.[79]

The solutions I propose in the next part are consistent with the CJC's discourse. Truly advancing access to justice requires giving litigants what they need to present their case. Reasonably modifying in-court practices so that all individuals can be heard does not erode impartiality—rather it allows for a fair process. The following part will delve into the challenges faced by SRLs and propose techniques to judges in efforts to facilitate cases with SRLs.

IV. Solutions for facilitating proceedings with SRLs

This part outlines procedural and evidentiary problems that arise in family law proceedings involving SRLs as identified by judges I interviewed. Subsequently, I propose solutions to those problems that are informed by these interviews, as well as current literature, jurisprudence, and legislative interpretation. The solutions I propose are useful and promising, given that they are informed by judges for judges. The problems and accompanying solutions are in the following categories: (1) Visualizing the legal process; (2) Determining the legal issues; (3) Modifying examination & cross-examination; (4) Dealing with a lack of objections; and (5) Failure to ask for certain claims.[80] Facilitating proceedings with SRLs can be a difficult task, generally requiring greater work on the part of the judiciary within an already overburdened legal system. Therefore, these solutions not only seek to better the experiences of SRLs, but also those of the judiciary, opposing counsel, and the general administration of justice.

1. Visualizing the legal process

a. Problem

The interviews revealed that SRLs often do not understand the different steps involved in family law cases or the components of an actual trial. For example, judges explained that SRLs are usually unaware that family law cases involve a mandatory mediation information session, proceedings dealing with interim orders, and the trial. Further, SRLs do not typically

79. Ibid. See also Cabana, supra note 49 at paras 43-50; Cabana v Newfoundland and Labrador, 2020 NLCA 44 at para 127: "Delivering trial fairness requires an individualized approach in every case. What is said to a self-represented litigant must not become formalistic exercise. There is no standardized "script." It must be tailored to the circumstances of each case."

80. This paper presumes that the SRL is often the vulnerable party. This is not always the case. In fact, a growing phenomenon is that SRLs in family law cases choose to be self-represented in order to personally be able to examine the opposing party and control the case. This is often seen in the context of abusive relationships and most often the SRL is a man (as explained by Interview, Judge 8, 5 November 2018). Further research will need to address this issue.

know that the trial is organized into opening statements, the introduction of evidence, examinations, and closing statements.[81] One judge explained that SRLs may get assistance from legal clinics prior to coming to court. However, legal clinics focus on educating SRLs on the substantive law applicable to the case, rather than procedural and evidentiary rules.[82] Hence, processes inside the courtroom remain largely unknown to and complex for SRLs.

Some of the judges interviewed explained that they provide a general roadmap or framework to explain how the proceeding will unfold: "I explain the steps in the procedure and what the [CCP] requires. I tell them that I understand that it is impossible to remember everything now, but that I will tell them where we are at each stage."[83] Other judges seemed to go the extra mile, as one described that they not only explain the procedure to the SRL, they subsequently ask the SRL to identify what they understood from this explanation to identify any gaps in the SRL's understanding.[84] While judges explained that this is helpful, they admitted that many SRLs often forget what they have been told.[85] Other judges stated that these types of explanations are not part of their practice,[86] or they cannot undertake this due to a lack of time.[87]

b. Solution

SRLs must receive information regarding the different proceedings involved in the legal process as well as the different steps of a trial. The solution I propose is to provide SRLs with a visual representation of each of these processes once they come before a judge (See Graphic 1 and Graphic 2 as examples below).[88] Currently, the CJC asks judges to "refer self-represented persons to other appropriate sources of information, education, advice and assistance."[89] What I propose goes one step further. Instead of referring an SRL to the pamphlets outside the courtroom, judges can use these pamphlets during their in-court explanations of legal processes to an SRL.

An abundance of public legal education resources have been created by courts and community organizations.[90] However, these are rarely used inside a courtroom.[91] I argue this information must become part of the regular court process undertaken by a judge assisting an SRL in the courtroom.[92] These visual aids could be held by court clerks and given to the SRL prior to commencing the proceeding. At this time, a judge can use the visual aid to explain the different steps involved in a family law case and/or trial. While a judge may explain this information orally, many SRLs would benefit from visual reminders given the stress of self-representing and SRLs' limited legal education.[93] Further, these aids can be used throughout the proceeding, as judges can refer to the graphic once they go from, for example, examination to cross-examination (Graphic 2).

The legalese in the graphics should be made into plain language to ensure they are understood by all.[94] They should also be offered in Braille

This suggestion aligns with numerous principles within the Statement of Principles on SRLs: CJC, "Statement of Principles," supra note 5 at 6-7: "Judges and court administrators should meet the needs of self-represented persons for information, referral, simplicity, and assistance. Judges and court administrators should develop forms, rules and procedures, which are understandable to and easily accessed by self-represented person […] In appropriate circumstances, judges should consider providing self-represented persons with information to assist them in understanding and asserting their rights, or to raise arguments before the court."

and translated into multiple languages to ensure that SRLs whose first language is neither French nor English can understand the process.[95] Ultimately, incorporating these visual aids into judges' routine explanations to SRLs would allow for greater understanding of the legal process.

2. Determining the legal issues

a. Problem

Judges highlighted that a major obstacle in cases involving SRLs is that they have not identified the precise legal issue to be resolved that day. One judge explained, "it's difficult to get the right information from the parties, to really know what the parties want and why they are in court that day."[96] SRLs often believe that all issues will be resolved in one proceeding.[97] However, family law matters involve numerous stages; some issues are resolved at an interim stage (such as child support and custody leading up to the trial), while others are resolved at a final stage (such as the division of family property). Moreover, SRLs struggle to parse relevant and irrelevant information based on the legal issue at hand. SRLs who lack legal advice and are unfamiliar with procedural law submit an abundance of irrelevant information: "Since they don't know what is important and relevant in a given situation, they respond to us with a very, very wide range of information; we end up having a lot of sorting to do."[98] Interviewees indicated that proceedings with SRLs are more prone to disorganization, particularly when both parties are self-represented.

b. Solution

I propose two ways to identify the legal issue(s) which must be resolved during the proceeding in question and ensure SRLs are aware of and understand them. One option is for the judge to summarize to the parties what they, as the judge, have understood as the main legal issues to be resolved that day. After reading the file, one judge explained that they list to the parties what they have understood as the main issues in dispute, then they ask the parties if any issues have been overlooked.[99]

Alternatively, the judge may ask each of the parties to briefly outline the main legal questions to be resolved. The judge then summarizes back to the parties what the judge has understood from both sides. In both scenarios, the judge should ask the SRL(s) if they have understood the requests made from the opposing party. If they have not, the judge should reiterate these requests in a simplified manner.[100]

These proposed solutions are in line with the CJC's Principles on SRLs that suggests when one or more SRLs are present, a judge may "inquire whether both parties understand the process and the procedure."[101] However, these solutions go a bit further by suggesting concrete ways a judge can inquire into an SRL's understanding of the legal process and the legal issues relevant to their case on that day. The second proposed solution, in particular, requires a judge to be satisfied that an SRL understands the current legal issue based on the explanation the SRL will provide. The SRL cannot simply acquiesce to understanding.

These solutions are evidently more time consuming in the short-term, specifically at the beginning of the proceeding. Whereas identifying the legal issues may take five seconds to two minutes with a lawyer, it often takes ten to thirty minutes with SRLs.[102] However, judges explained this technique will likely save time in the long term.[103] Furthermore, it also requires more pre-court preparation time, as judges must take more time to read the file. One judge explained that they will suspend court for ten to fifteen minutes when they realize one or more SRLs are involved in the case: "I suspend and reread the entire file."[104] Nonetheless, this solution ensures organization of the proceeding, which benefits the judge and the parties. It also allows SRLs to focus on the information that is relevant to the specific proceeding. Finally, this technique is especially useful when there is a lack of communication between the two parties. By putting both parties on the same page at the beginning of the proceeding, the judge effectively builds a bridge between them.[105] While the practices explained above may seem rudimentary, determining and/or clarifying the legal issues is crucial to helping SRLs have their voices heard and ensuring they understand the content of proceedings.

3. Modifying examination and cross-examination

a. Problem

Every judge I interviewed emphasized that SRLs struggle to understand and differentiate between pleadings, examination, and cross-examination. One judge stated, "instead of questioning the witness during examination, unrepresented parties often start talking to me and tell me their claims."[106] Another judge explained, "often, in cross-examination, the party does not even ask questions. Rather, they criticize the interrogation of the first party by saying none of that is true!"[107] This issue must be addressed to save time and simplify proceedings for both SRLs and judges.

b. Solution

I propose two solutions to address this challenge. First, judges can attempt to explain what each of these examinations consist of—using Graphic 2 proposed above would provide an extra tool to assist in these explanations. Second, if after doing so, the SRL is unable to properly grasp and follow the different stages of the trial, an effective solution is to modify the examination and cross-examination. Accordingly, the judge can modify the order of the proceeding by suspending the cross-examination and allowing the SRL to testify.[108] One judge explained how they utilize this technique:

> This is how I explain it to the unrepresented person: What I sense is that you can't wait to tell me your version. So, what I propose is that you suspend your cross-examination and testify. I am not cancelling your cross-examination. After your testimony, if you have any questions for the lady, we will resume your cross-examination.[109]

Après votre témoignage, si vous avez des questions à poser à madame on va reprendre votre contre-interrogatoire."

Generally, SRLs simply want to voice their side of the story to the judge and do not have questions to ask the opposing party.[110] By suspending the cross-examination instead of cancelling it, this ensures that the litigant's procedural rights are still protected if they ever wish to come back to the cross-examination. Suspending the cross-examination is in line with the principle of proportionality[111]: modifying procedural rules to the capacities of the litigant before the court will "facilitate the resolution of disputes and bring out the substantive law and ensure that it is carried out."[112] Furthermore, the technique helps save time, as allowing an SRL to improperly continue with a cross-examination leads to repeated objections by the opposing lawyer.[113] In the case of two SRLs, one judge explained this technique brings about the contentious issues immediately: "Then, I have both versions and can guide the trial more efficiently."[114]

Judges utilizing this technique concluded that it greatly simplified proceedings and therefore rendered them more accessible to SRLs: "it works nine out of ten times."[115] Despite the purported efficacy of this approach, only three judges interviewed reported using this technique.[116] There is reason to be optimistic about this technique being adopted by judges, as it received a great deal of positive feedback during the February 2020 judicial conference. Therefore, it seems the issue with this solution is not its effectiveness, but rather judges' awareness of it and whether they utilize it in the courtroom. Ultimately, suspending the cross-examination is a valuable technique advantageous to both SRLs and judges. Judges can better manage proceedings and save time, while SRLs can voice their concerns promptly and therefore feel heard.

4. Dealing with a lack of objections

a. Problem

A preeminent advantage of legal representation is that a lawyer will ensure their client's rights are respected: "The lawyers are the watchdogs."[117] However, without legal representation, SRLs are often unaware of the possibility of raising objections when procedural and evidentiary rules are not being followed. For example, judges explained that SRLs often do not raise objections to improper leading questions being asked by opposing counsel or to the admission of evidence via hearsay.[118] Another judge described a situation where the opposing lawyer was attempting to admit documents that had not been disclosed to the SRL prior to trial.[119] Judges interviewed highlighted the difficult and delicate position in which they are placed when these situations arise. While judges cannot become an advocate for the SRL and raise the objection,[120] they must ensure procedural fairness and that "the rights of all parties are not infringed."[121]

Some judges stated they steer clear from these potentially conflictual situations, insisting, "I cannot object on behalf of the litigant."[122] Others stated they creatively attempt to mitigate the imbalance between an SRL and a lawyer.[123] Interviews demonstrated that judges are more concerned about a lack of objections by an SRL when the proceeding involves one SRL and a represented party, rather than when a proceeding involves two SRLs. In the latter case, a lack of objections on the part of either or both SRLs is generally not as problematic, as they are operating on a relatively equal playing field. Accordingly, judges explained that in such a situation they may reasonably loosen the rules of evidence, allowing both parties to have their case heard without being unnecessarily impeded by procedural or evidentiary requirements.[124] For example, certain judges explained that often both parties will admit evidence via hearsay. When deliberating, the judge will determine the weight they should assign to this evidence according to the rest of the case presented by each litigant.[125] Some judges allow SRLs to present proof of employment or earnings via copies or letters, rather than originals or authentic acts.[126] Thus, in cases with two SRLs, judges often deal with a lack of objections by both sides by loosening evidentiary rules. This is in line with the principle of proportionality[127] and the objective of bringing out the substantive law to allow the case to be heard and resolved.[128]

While a lack of objections may not be problematic in proceedings involving two SRLs, SRLs may still be prejudiced by their lack of knowledge regarding how and when to object, specifically when opposed by a represented party. This must be addressed to facilitate fair proceedings for all litigants.

b. Solution

In cases where one party is self-represented and the other is represented by counsel, I propose that a judge can intervene when they believe that a lack of an objection would infringe the principles of natural justice, procedural equity, or the best interests of the child. To be clear, the judge would not be making the objection for the SRL. Rather, in these circumstances, the judge would remind the opposing lawyer of their obligation to respect the rules of procedure and evidence required by the court. Article 19 CCP states the following: "the parties control the course of their case insofar as they comply with the principles, objectives and rules of procedure and the prescribed time limits."[129] In addition to lawyers being bound by the rules of procedure and evidence, both parties must "refrain from acting with the intent to cause prejudice to another person or behaving in an excessive or unreasonable manner, contrary to the requirements of good faith."[130] Further, the CCP reminds lawyers that they cannot knowingly prejudice another party to advance their case. Indeed, lawyers know they cannot admit evidence via hearsay or rely on suggestive questions except in limited circumstances. Consequently, in cases where a judge feels an objection should have been made by the SRL and a lack thereof is likely to prejudice them, a judge can remind opposing counsel of their obligation to respect the rules of the court.

In the event of suggestive questions raised by the opposing lawyer, one judge explained that they intervened by remarking, "counsel, the court is aware that the other party is self-represented; your question could be worded differently."[131] In addition to these interventions, judges emphasized the role of body language. In particular, one judge highlighted its importance in dissuading lawyers from undertaking oppressive acts: "Non-verbal communication can say a lot. My non-verbal will indicate, What is that question? Where are you going with this? Professional lawyers will know their judges, they will know how to read them and maintain eye contact."[132] Coupling verbal interventions with appropriate body language is helpful when the SRL has failed to raise an objection which may prejudice them. Ultimately, these types of interventions are in line with Comment 2.D.2 of the Ethical Principles.[133] They maintain the impartiality of the judge while upholding the procedural rights of all parties to the proceeding and ensuring an equitable process.[134]

Importantly, judges may intervene to prevent certain evidence from being admitted when a lawyer's failure to comply with procedural or evidentiary rules would violate public order or the rights of a child.[135] For example, one judge explained that if a lawyer attempts to admit psycho-social reports of an adolescent to corroborate their position, the judge would intervene even without the objection of the SRL and disallow the party from admitting the evidence. The judge would ask how the document was received and request proof of the adolescent's consent for its use in court.[136] This scenario is in line with article 2848 Civil Code of Québec (CCQ) which permits the court "even of its own motion, [to] reject any evidence obtained under such circumstances that fundamental rights and freedoms are violated and whose use would tend to bring the administration of justice into disrepute."[137] Hence, when the rights of a child are being violated by a party and the opposing party has not made an objection, the judge may intervene on their own initiative.

5. Addressing a failure to ask for claims

a. Problem

Judges interviewed noted that SRLs regularly neglect to ask for certain claims, notably a provision for costs or child-related claims. For example, SRLs may not be aware of their duty to provide reciprocal information and their right to obtain that information from the other party. At times, they may fail to disclose their income or to ask the other party to do so.[138] Further, an SRL may not know that a provision for costs exists or that they could ask for it if their situation warrants it.[139] This is an unfortunate predicament given that most SRLs find themselves self-represented due to their precarious financial situation.[140] An SRL may fail to ask for support for certain child-related expenses, such as retroactive child support,[141] medical or dental insurance,[142] or certain special and extraordinary expenses.[143]

Judges admitted that their duty of assistance is limited in these situations, as such interactions can rapidly become legal advice. When asked if they employ any techniques to mitigate these, most judges answered that they didn't and that they were unaware of what could be done.[144] While some judges stated that it was up to the SRL to get a lawyer,[145] others affirmed that these situations need to be addressed, as they illustrate clear instances where an SRL is disadvantaged.[146] One judge explained, "obviously, the person will suffer a harm, but we can't prepare the case for them."[147] Another judge noted that in these scenarios they will make general comments about the benefits of receiving legal advice to the SRL: "Without naming things precisely, I will say that because of the claims made in your file, it would be in your best interest to consult a lawyer."[148] However, this same judge said that these measures were insufficient, as the parties regularly proceed without legal representation despite the advice and will not know the gaps in their file. These challenges need to be addressed, especially for SRLs of lower socio-economic status and women. For example, a failure to request certain child-related expenses or costs can have far-reaching consequences on the SRL and the children associated with the file.

b. Solution

The following provides two potential solutions to address the two challenges elucidated above: the failure of an SRL to 1) ask for a provision for costs; and 2) ask for child-related claims. Unlike the other solutions proposed in previous sections, judges I interviewed had little or nothing to suggest in terms of how to rectify situations when SRLs fail to ask for certain claims. In fact, during many interviews, they would turn the question around on me, asking what I would suggest in these situations.[149] After the interviews, I began thinking about how these problems could be addressed. I developed the following proposed solutions based on recent literature, jurisprudence, and legislative interpretation. Subsequently, I discussed these possibilities during the judicial conference I facilitated in February 2020. The feedback received during the judicial conference helped modify and strengthen the proposed solutions.[150]

Provision for Costs

A provision for costs is an order by the court which requires one party to pay for part of the legal costs of the opposing party associated with a family law file. A judge may order a provision for costs when one party, as a result of their financial situation, would be otherwise unable to effectively present their case.[151] The underlying goal of a provision for

151. CCP, supra note 8, art 416. See also CCQ, supra note 120, art 588(2). See Droit de la famille-191999, 2019 QCCS 4145 at para 52 which explains the differences between the articles: "Contrary to article 588 [CCQ] which authorizes the court to grant a provision for costs only in costs is to attempt to place both parties on an equal playing field in cases where the financial resources of one party are incommensurate with those of the other. The provision for costs seeks to facilitate a fair and equitable trial.[152] When an SRL has not asked for a provision for costs, yet a judge believes it is appropriate in the circumstances,[153] I propose that a judge can, on their own initiative, order it. I argue that a judge has authority to do so for two reasons.

First, the criteria that must be met for a provision for costs to be granted do not require that the party obtaining it raise the request themselves. The Quebec Court of Appeal has outlined principles that a judge should consider when ordering a provision for costs. The judge must consider the financial means of the party claiming the provision for costs and the resources of the debtor party. When doing so, six criteria should be considered: (1) the nature and importance of the dispute; (2) the means of the parties; (3) the respective behaviour of each party; (4) the amount of child support; (5) the protection of the children associated to the dispute.[154] Nowhere in the criteria listed by the Quebec Court of Appeal is the party receiving the provision for costs required to raise this issue on their own initiative. While the judge must be convinced that each criterion has been met, this does not include the party actually raising the issue in the first place.[155] For this reason, I argue that when a judge hears a case involving a self-represented party who's financial situation is impeding their ability to present their case, they may bring the provision for costs to the attention of the parties. If the receiving party meets the necessary criteria, a judge can order the provision for costs.

Second, the provision for costs is a discretionary measure.[156] The underlying objective of the provision for costs is to allow eligible parties to obtain the services of a lawyer. In Droit de la famille-16940, the court stated the provision for costs "is intended to allow the economically disadvantaged party to assert its rights, with a view to a fair and equitable resolution to the dispute, but should not encourage and fuel unnecessary proceedings."[157] Further, in Droit de la famille-18230, the court insisted a provision for costs seeks to promote access to justice and fairness, allowing both parties to oppose each other on equal footing.[158] Therefore, courts have recognized that a provision for costs is a tool that should be used to promote a fair and equitable proceeding. The discretionary nature of this provision allows judges to order it on their own initiative in order to fulfill its underlying objectives when the party meets the corresponding criteria.

Practically, in a case where the judge believes the SRL is economically weaker than the other party, which undermines the SRL's ability to assert their rights, the judge may ask the SRL if they are making a request for a provision for costs. The judge may then direct the SRL to article 416 CCP or 588(2) CCP, and, if necessary, explain the general criteria that must be met for the provision to be granted. Such direction from the judge does not amount to becoming the SRL's advocate, as it remains the latter's responsibility to ensure that the evidence before the court is sufficient to meet the criteria. If such evidence is before the court, the judge may grant the order.

The provision for costs is not automatically granted simply because one is self-represented.[159] Judges must carefully consider whether the circumstances justify the order. However, if an SRL meets the criteria, judges should ensure the litigant does not fail to benefit from the provision for costs simply because they were unaware of its existence. Indeed, judges confirmed that a provision for costs is most useful when one party is represented and the other is not.[160] It is also relevant when there exists a significant power imbalance between the two parties as a result of the litigants' financial situations or domestic violence history.[161] Ultimately, the provision for costs is a discretionary measure that ensures an equitable and just process for the most vulnerable litigants.[162] To give full effect to the underlying objectives of the provision for costs, I argue that a judge can grant this when the criteria are met, even when the receiving party does not raise the request on their own initiative.

Child-Related Claims

SRLs often omit to ask for certain child-related expenses.[163] In these circumstances, I suggest that a judge may raise this omission to the parties. Take, for example, where an SRL pays for the entire cost of their child's braces and fails to ask for the associated special and extraordinary expenses. After considering the evidence before them, a judge may ask the SRL if they plan on making a request related to special and extraordinary expenses by directing the SRL to the appropriate section in the Federal Child Support Guidelines.[164] Despite the SRL not having made the initial request, if the evidence before the judge demonstrates that special and extraordinary expenses should be ordered, then the judge may grant them. While this solution requires the judge to raise the omission to the parties, it does not consist of the judge providing the evidence nor the arguments to justify granting the order. The SRL must present this evidence to the court, which the judge then weighs. Once again, the judge does not become the SRL's advocate, but rather ensures that all evidence is before them to make an informed child support order in the best interests of the child.

This intervention can be justified pursuant to two duties imposed by the CCQ in family law cases. First, adjudicating courts must make all decisions relating to children in the best interests of the children.[165] Second, a judge rendering a decision relating to child support has a duty to ensure the respect of child support which is of public order.[166] In other words, a judge must make a decision regarding child support that reflects the best interests of the child. If an SRL's failure to request extraordinary expenses undermines this principle, I argue a judge may intervene to raise the omission. In this same vein, a judge would also be able to intervene to raise omissions on the part of a lawyer if failing to do so would jeopardize the best interests of the child.

Support for this solution can be found in article 268 CCP (previously article 292 CCP), which allows the court to "draw the parties' attention to any deficiency in the proof or procedure and authorize the parties to remedy it, subject to the conditions it determines."[167] This provision is analyzed in depth in Droit de la famille-16436.[168] The court explained that the provision gives the trial judge discretion to bring a perceived injustice to the parties' attention. However, the judge is not permitted to intervene substantially or to drive the presentation of the proof. These deficiencies must also be significant enough as to fundamentally affect the outcome of the case should they go entirely unaddressed.[169]

Article 268 CCP gives judges the discretion to raise a deficiency in evidence or procedure.[170] If a judge allowed child support to be granted without addressing the failure of the SRL to speak to the issue of special or extraordinary expenses that are otherwise relevant, this would constitute a deficiency in the evidence and undermine the fundamental principle of rendering decisions in the best interest of the child. Therefore, intervening per the solution I propose ensures that a decision is rendered in a just manner all while maintaining the judge's impartiality.

There are other instances in the CCP where the legislator has given judges the tools to highlight omissions on behalf of the parties. For example, article 49 CCP gives judges "all the powers necessary to exercise their jurisdiction. […They] may make such orders as are appropriate to deal with situations for which no solution is provided by law."[171] Similarly, article 446 CCP authorizes a judge to supplement missing information, such as parent's income.[172] These are but two examples that demonstrate how the legislator empowers judges to undertake active adjudication, particularly in situations where an injustice would result from their inaction.[173]

The solution I propose above is in line with these provisions of the CCP, as well as the duty to render decisions in the best interests of the child and uphold the public order of child support. Accordingly, raising omissions by SRLs related to certain child-related claims ensures an equitable resolution of the file, where the judge retains their impartiality to render a judgement on the totality of the evidence.

for judges to mitigate these obstacles. The success of these solutions depends on their adequate implementation. Interviews demonstrated that while some judges consistently assist SRLs and routinely employ many of the techniques discussed above, others do not. Truly promoting access to justice for all litigants requires that the duty of assistance given to SRLs be systemic and consistent. For example, we cannot have some judges modifying examination and cross-examination in proceedings with SRLs while others do not. The degree to which an SRL is assisted and is able to access justice should not depend on the judge before them. As a legal community we must want to foster active adjudication by spreading the word through systemic and mandatory continued judicial education. As the number of SRLs continue to rise, all judges need to be adequately trained to respond to the needs of those before them.[174] Greater judicial education would allow all judges to become aware of these techniques and apply them consistently when needed.[175]

Through qualitative interviews undertaken with ten judges at the Superior Court of Québec, this study considered procedural and evidentiary challenges faced by SRLs in family law matters. Based on these interviews, recent literature, and jurisprudence, it provided solutions to the problems identified. These solutions seek to improve access to justice for SRLs within a framework that upholds judges' duties of impartiality and assistance to create a fair process for all.

Although a separate set of rules for SRLs and lawyers is not the answer, rules must be conceptualized and tailored to those who must abide by them. Are SRLs able to tell their story? Do they leave the courtroom feeling heard and understood? The legal system exists to serve the public. Therefore, whether justice has been achieved must also be considered from the perspectives of SRLs. SRLs comprise a vast segment of those using Canadian courts, particularly in family law: "[SRLs] are not, as they are too often seen, an inconvenience; they are why the system exists."[176] Unfortunately, our legal system has been designed with a different, legally-trained clientele in mind. It is time that we "put the public first"[177] and create systems responsive to the realities of everyday people who must

174. This also requires judicial education focused on the lived experiences of diverse litigants that come before the courts.
175. While judicial education is and continues to focus on SRLs, this is not mandatory for all judges. Moreover, the public has no ability to know what training judges have taken in a certain area of law, nor the amount. Further, the content of many judicial trainings is not publicly available. For example, the National Judicial Institute does not often make the subject or content of their continuing judicial education publicly available..

engage in them. Former Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella has long called for change in this direction: "[we must redesign] a whole new way to deliver justice to ordinary people with ordinary disputes and ordinary bank accounts. That's what real access to justice needs and that's what the public is entitled to get."[178] Truly promoting access to justice requires a change in how we operate and a readiness to explore innovative solutions.

Appendix A

Interview Questions

The data collection process will consist of semi-structured interviews lasting approximately 60 minutes each, with 10 judges. The interviews will be conducted in English or French, based on the wishes of participants. All questions relate to family law cases.

(1) What did you do before being appointed as a judge?
(2) Do you find you are increasingly seeing self-represented litigants in family law cases?
    a. What is the approximate percentage of family law cases you hear in which at least one party is a self-represented litigant?
    b. Is that percentage higher in family law than other areas of law?
(3) Are there things you do differently with a self-represented litigant in a family law case than another case?
(4) Do you deal differently when one party is a self-represented litigant vs. when both are?
(5) Do you think a judge should assist self-represented litigants? For example, explaining procedure, clarifying the position and legal issues through questioning, etc.?
    a. To what extent do you assist self-represented litigants during trials? Can you think of examples where you have assisted self-represented litigants?
    b. What are some of the techniques you use when interacting with self-represented litigants?
    c. How successful do you find these techniques in simplifying and expediting procedures?
(6) Do you think there are potential concerns regarding judges' increased interactions or involvement with self-represented litigants?
(7) What solutions would you propose to facilitate your interactions with self-represented litigants?
(8) Under the new CCP, judges have been given greater case management powers. Do you think this has had an impact on facilitating interactions with self-represented litigants?
(9) The literature often insists that self-represented litigants fare worse than those with legal representation. Do you believe that self-represented litigants are disadvantaged by their lack of legal representation? Does this have an impact on the outcome of the case?

(10) Do you believe it would be beneficial to have all family law cases dealt with in accordance with special case management (ie: dealt with by one judge throughout)?
(11) Do you think Quebec, like Ontario, should impose mandatory mediation for family law cases?
(12) Do you believe Quebec would benefit from a separate family law court, such as a unified family court in Ontario?
(13) Do you think a solution to tackling the challenges associated with self-represented litigants is increased legal aid?

Montreal Declaration
UNIVERSAL DECLARATION ON THE INDEPENDENCE OF JUSTICE

Unanimously adopted at the final plenary session of the First World Conference on the Independence of Justice held at Montreal (Quebec, Canada) on June 10th, 1983.

Preamble
Whereas justice constitutes one of the essential pillars of liberty;

Whereas the free exercise of fundamental human rights as well as peace between nations can only be secured through respect for the rule of law;

Whereas States have long established courts and other institutions with a view to assuring that justice be duly administered in their respective territories;

Whereas the Charter of the United Nations has established the international Court of Justice as its principal judicial organ in order to promote the peaceful solution of disputes between States, in conformity with the principles of justice and international law;

Whereas the Statute of the International Court of Justice provides that the latter shall be composed of a body of independent judges, elected regardless of nationality, which as a whole shall be representative of the main forms of civilisation and of the principal legal systems of the world;

Whereas various Treaties have established other courts endowed with an international competence, which equally owe exclusive allegiance to the international legal order and benefit from representation of diverse legal systems;

Whereas the jusrisdiction vested in international courts shall be respected in order to facilitate the interpretation, application and progressive development of international law and the promotion of human rights;

Whereas national and international courts shall, within the sphere of their competence, cooperate in the achievement of the foregoing objectives;

Whereas all those institutions, national and international, must, within the scope of their competence, seek to promote the lofty objectives set out in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Optional Protocol to the latter Covenant and other pertinent international instruments, objectives which embrace the independence of the administration of the justice;

Whereas such independence must be guaranteed to international judges, national judges, lawyers, jurors and assessors;

Whereas the foundations of the independence of justice and the conditions of its exercise may benefit from restatement;

The World Conference of the Independence of Justice recommends to the United Nations on the consideration of this Declaration.

1. International Judges

Definitions
LOl In this chapter:
a) "judges" means international judges and arbitrators;
b "court" means an international court or tribunal of universal, regional, community or specialized competence.

Independence

1.02 The international status of judges shall require and assure their individual and collective independence and their impartial and conscientious exercise of their functions in the common interest Accordingly; States shall respect the international character of the responsibilities of judges and shall not seek to influence them in the discharge of these responsibilities

1.03 Judges and courts shall be free in the performance of their duties to ensure that the Rule of Law is observed, and shall not admit influence from any government or any other authority external to their statutes and the interests of international justice.

1.04 When governing treaties give international courts the competence to determine their rules of procedure, such rules shall come into and remain in force upon adoption by the courts concerned.

1.05 Judges shall enjoy freedom of thought and, in the exercise of their duties, shall avoid being influenced by any considerations other than those of international justice.

1.06 The ethical standards required of national judges Sun the exercise of the judicial functions shall apply to judges of international courts.

1.07 The principles of judicial independence embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international instruments for the protection of human rights shall apply to judges.

1.08 Judges shall promote the principle of the due process of law as being an integral part of the independence of justice.

1.09 N reseation shall be made or admitted to treaty provisions relating to the fundamental principles of independence of the judiciary.

1.10 Neither the accession of a state to the statute of a court nor the creation of new international courts Shall affect the validity of these fundamental principles.

Appointment

1.11 Judges shall be nominated and appointed, or elected in accordance with governing constitutional and statutory provisions which shall, if possible, not confine the power of nomination to governments or make nomination dependent on nationality.

1.12 Only a jurist of recognized standing shall be appointed or elected to be a judge of an International court.

1.13 When the statute of a court provides that judges shall be appointed on the recommendation of a government, such appointment shall not be made in circumstances in which that government may subsequently exert any influence upon the judge.

Compensation
1.14 The. terms of compensation and pension of judges shall be established and maintained so as to ensure their independence. Those terms shall take into account the recognized limitations upon their professional pursuits both during and after their tenure of office. which are defined either by their statute or recognized and accepted in practice.

Immunities and Privileges

1.15 Judges shall enjoy privileges and immunities, facilities and prerogatives, no less than those conferred upon chiefs of diplomatic missions under and recognized by the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. Only the nowt concerned may lift these immunities.

1.16 Judges shall not be liable for acts done in their official capacity.

1.17 a) In view of the importance of secrecy of judicial deliberations to the integrity and independence of the judicial process, judges shall respect secrecy in, and in relation to their judicial deliberations;
b States and other external authorities shall respect and protect the secrecy and confidentiality of the courts' deliberations at all stages.

Discipline and Removal

1.18 All measures of discipline and removal relating to judges shall be governed exclusively by the statutes and rules of their courts, and be within their jurisdiction.

1.19 Judges shall not bc removed from office, except by u decision of the other members of the court and in accordance with its statute.
Judges Ad Roe and Arbitrators

1.20 Unless reference to the context necessarily makes it inapplicable or inappropriate, the foregoing articles shall apply to judges ad hoc and to arbitrators in public international arbitrations.

IL National Judges
Objectives and Functions

2.01 The objectives and functions of the judiciary shall include:
a) to administer the law impartially between citizen and citizen, and between citizen and state;
b) to promote, within the proper limits of the judicial function, the observance and the attainment of human rights;
c) to ensure that all peoples are able to live securely under the rule of law.

Independence

2.02 Judges individually shall be free, and it shall be their duty, to decide matters before them impartially, in accordance with their assessment of the facts and their understanding of the law without any restrictions, influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason.

2.03 In the decision-making process, judges shall be independent vis-a-vis their judicial colleagues and superiors. Any hierarchical organization of the judiciary and any difference in grade or rank shall in no way interfere with the right of the judge to pronounce his judgment freely.

2.04 The judiciary shall be independent of the Executive and Legislative.

2.05 The judiciary shall have jurisdiction, directly or by way or review, over all issues of a judicial nature. -

a) No ad hoc tribunals shall be established;
b) Everyone shall have the right to be tried expeditiously by the established ordinary courts or judicial tribunals under law, subject to review by the courts;
c) Some derogations may be admitted in times of grave public emergency which threatens the life of the nation but only under conditions pre rihed by law, and only to the extent strictly consistent with internationally rognied minimum standards and subject to review by the courts;
d) in such times of emergency
I. Civilians charged with criminal offences of any kind shall be tried by ordinary civilian courts, expanded where necessary by additional competent civilian judges;

H. Detention of persons administratively without charge shall be subject to review by ordinary courts by way of habeas corpus or similar procedures, so as to insure that the detention is lawful, as well as to inquire into any allegations of ill-treatment;

e) The jurisdiction of military tribunals shall he confined to military offences committed by military personnel. There shall always be right of app ei from such tribunals to a legally qualified anoellate court. ith the power shall be exercised so as to intcrfcrc ;ve judicial process.
b) The Executive shall not have control over judicial functions.
c) The Executive shall not have the power to close down or suspend the operation of the courts.

d) The Executive shall refrain from any act or omission which preempts the judicial resolution of a dispute or frustrates the proper execution of a court decision.

2.08 No legislation or executive decree shall attempt retroactively, to reverse specific court decisions, nor to change the composition of the court to affect its decision-making.

2.09 Judges may take collective action to protect their judicial independence.

2.10 Judges shall always conduct themselves in such a manner as to Preserve the dignity of their office and the impartiality and independence of the judiciary. Subject to this principle, judges shall be entitled to freedom of belief, expression, association and assembly.

Qualifications, Selections and Training

2.11 candidates for judicial office shall be individuals of integrity and ability, well trained in the law. They shall have equality of access to judicial office.

2.12 In. the selection of judges, there shall be no discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or status, subject however to citizenship requirements.

2.13 The process and standards of judicial selection shall give due consideration to ensuring a fair reflection by the judiciary of the society in all its aspects.

a) There is no single proper method of judicial selection provided it safeguards against judicial appointments for improper motives.
b) Participation in judicial appointments by the Executive or Legislature is consistent with judicial independence, so long as appointments of judges are made in consultation with members of the judiciary and the legal profession or by a body in which members of the judiciary and the legal profession participate.

2.15 Continuing education shall be available to judges.

Posting, Promotion and Transfer

2.16 The-assignment of a judge, to a post within the court to which he is appointed is an internal adEninistrative function to be carried out by the judiciary.
(Explanatory Note: Unless assignments are made by the court, there is a danger of erosion of judicial independence by outside interference. It is vital that the court not make assignments as a result of any bias or prejudice or in response to external pressures. These comments are not intended to exclude the practice in some countries of requiring that assignments be approved by a Superior Council of the judiciary or similar body.)

2.17 Promotion of a judge shall be based on an objective assessment 01 the candidate's integrity and independence of judgment, professional competence, experience, humanity and commitment to uphold the rule of law. Article 2.14 shall apply to promotions.

2.18 Except pursuant to a system of regular rotation, judges shall not be transferred from one jurisdiction or function to another without their consent, but such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld.
[Explanatory Note: Unless this principle is accepted, transfer can be used to punish an independent and courageous judge, and to deter others from following his example. This principle is not intended to interfere with sound administrative practices enumerated in the law. Thus exceptions may be made, for example, where a judge in his early years is transferred from post to post to enrich his judicial experience.]
Tenure

a) The term of office of the judges, their independence, security, adequate remuneration and conditions of service shall be secured by law and shall not be altered to their detriment.
b) Judges, whether appointed or elected, shall have guaranteed tenure until a mandatory retirement age or expiry of their term of office, where such exists.

2.20 The appointment of temporary judges and the appointment of judges for probationary periods is inconsistent with judicial independence. Where such appointments exist, they shall be phased out gradually.
[Explanatory Note: This text Is not intended to exclude part-time judges. Where such practice exists, proper safeguards shall be laid down to ensure impartiality and avoid conflict of interests. Nor is this text intended to exclude probationary periods for judges after their initial appointment, in countries which have a career judiciary, such as in civil law countries.]

a) During their terms of office, judges shall receive salaries and after retirement, they shall receive pensions.
b) The salaries and pensions of judges shall be adequate, commensurate with the status, dignity and responsibility of their office, and be regularly adjusted to account fully for price increases.
c) Judicial salaries shall not be decreased during the judges' term of office, except as a coherent part of an overall public economic measure.

2.22 Retirement age shall not be altered for judges in office without their consent.

2.23 The executive authorities shall, at all times, ensure the security and physical protection of judges and their families.
Immunities and Privileges

2.24 Judges shall enjoy immunity from suit, or harassment, for acts and omissions in their official capacity.

a) Judges shall be bound by professional secrecy in relation to their deliberations, and to confidential information acquired in the course of their duties other tan in public proceedings.
b) Judges shall not be requried to testify on such matters.

Disqualifications

2.26 Judges may not serve in an executive or a legislative capacity unless it is clear that these functions are combined, without compromising judicial independence.

2.27 Judges may not serve as chairmen or members of committees of inquiry, except in cases where judicial skills are required.

2.28 Judges shall not be active members of, or hold positions in, political parties.
[Explanatory Note: This text is not intended to permit membership of judges in political parties in countries where under law or practice such is excluded, but to lay down standards limiting the scope of judicial involvement in countries where such membership is permissible.]

2.29 Judges may not practice law. [Explanatory Note: See note 2.20.]

2.30 Judges shall refrain from business activities, except as incidental to their personal investments or their ownership of property.

2.31 A judge shall not sit in a case where a reasonable apprehension of bias on his part may arise.

Discipline and Removal

2.32 A complaint against a judge shall be processed expeditiously and fairly under an appropriate practice, and the judge shall have the opportunity to comment on the complaint at the initial stage. The examination of the complaint at its initial stage shall be kept confidential, unless otherwise requested by the judge.

a) The proceedings for judicial removal or discipline, when such are initiated, shall be held before a court or a board predominantly composed of members of the judiciary and selected- by. the judiciary.
b) However, the power of removal may be vested in the Legislature by Impeachment or joint address, prèfèrably upon a recommendation of a court or board as referred to in 2.33(a).
(Explanatory Note: in countries where the legal profession plays an indispensable role in maintaining the rule of law and judicial independence, it is recommended that members of the legal profession participate in the selection of the members of the court or board, and be included as members thereof.

2.34 All disciplinary action shall be based upon established standards of judicial conduct.

2.35 The proceedings for discipline of judges shall ensure fairness to the judge and the opportunity of a full hearing. discipline and removal shall be held in camera. The judge may, however, request that the hearing be held in public, subject to a final and reasoned disposition of this request by the disciplinary Tribunal. Judgments in disciplinary proceedings, whether held in camera or in public, may be published.

2.37 With the exception of proceedings before the Legislature or in connection with them, the decision of a disciplinary Tribunal shall be subject to appeal to a court.

2.38 A judge shall not be subject to removal except on proved grounds of incapacity or misbehaviour, rendering him unfit to continue in office.

2.39 In the event that a court is abolished, judges serving in this court shall not be affected, except for their transfer to another court of the same status.

Court Administration

2.40 The main responsibility for court administration shall vest in the judiciary.

2.41 It shall be a priority of the highest order, for the state to provide adequate resources to allow for the due administration of justice, including physical facilities appropriate for the maintenance of judicial independence, dignity and efficiency, judicial and adminstrative personnel, and operating budgets.

2.42 The budget of the court shall be prepared by the competent authority in collaboration with the judiciary. The judiciary shall submit their estimate of the budget requirements to the appropriate authority.

2.43 The judiciary shall alone be responsible for assigning cases to individual judges or to sections of a court composed of several judges, in accordance with law or rules of court.

2.44 The head of the court may exercise supervisory powers over judges on administrative matters.

Miscellaneous

2.45 A judge shall ensure the fair conduct of the trial and inquire fully into any allegation made of a violation of the rights of a party or of a witness, including allegations of ill-treatment.

2.46 Judges shall accord respect to the members of the Bar.

2.47 The state shall ensure the due and proper execution of orders and judgments of the courts; but supervision over the execution of orders and judgments process shall be vested in the judiciary.

2.48 Judges shall keep themselves informed about international conventions and other instruments establishing human rights' norms, and shall seek to Implement them as far as feasible, within the limits set by their national constitutions and laws.

2.49 The provisions of Chapter II: National Judges, shall apply to all persons exercising judicial functions, including arbitrators and public prosecutors, unless reference to the context necessarily makes them inapplicable or inappropriate.

ilL Lawyers
Definitions
3.01 In this chapter:
a) "lawyer" means a person qualified and authorized to practice before the courts, and to advise and represent his clients in legal matters;
b) "Bar association" means the recognized professional association to which lawyers within a given jurisdiction belong.

General Principles

3.02 The legal profession is one of the institutions referred to in the preamble to this declaration. Its independence constitutes an essential guarantee for the promotion and protection of human rights.

3.03 There shall be a fair and equitable system of administration of justice, which guarantees the independence of lawyers in the discharge of their professional duties without any restrictions, influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason.

3.04 All persons shall have effective access to legal services provided by an independent lawyer, to protect and establish their economic, social and cultural, as well as civil and political rights.

Legal Education and Entry into the Legal Profession

3.05 Legal education shall be open to all persons with requisite qualifications, and no one shall be denied such opportunity by reason of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or status.

3.06 Legal education shall be designed to promote in the public interest, in addition to technical competence, awareness of the ideals and ethical duties of the lawyer, and of human rights and fundamental freedoms recognized by national And international law.

3.07 Programmes of legal education shall have regard to the social responsibilities of the lawyer, including cooperation in providing legal services to the poor and the promotion and defence of economic, social and cultural rights in the process of development.

3.0.8. Every person having the necessary integrity, good character and qualifications
In law shall be entitled to become a lawyer, and to continue in practice without discrimination for having been convicted of an offence for exercising his internationally recognized civil or political rights.

Education of the Public Concerning the Law

3.09 It shall be the responsibility of the lawyer to educate the members of the public about the principles of the rule of law, the importance of the independence of the judiciary and of the legal profession and to inform them about their rights and duties, and the relevant and available remedies.

Rights and Duties of Lawyers

3.10 The duties of a lawyer towards his client include: a) advising the client as to his legal rights and obligations; b) taking legal action to protect him and his interests; and, where required, c) representing him before courts, tribunals or administrative authorities.

3.11 The lawyer, in discharging his duties, shall at all times act freely, diligently and fearlessly in accordance with the wishes of his client and subject to the established rules, standards and ethics of his profession without any inhibition or pressure from the authorities or the public.

3.12 Every person and group of persons is entitled to call upon the assistance of a lawyer to defend his or its interests or cause within the law, and it is the duty of the lawyer to do so to the best of his ability. Consequently the lawyer is not to be identified by the authorities or the public with his client or his client's cause, however popular or unpopular it may be.

3.13 No lawyer shall suffer or be threatened with penal, civil, administrative, economic or other sanctions by reason of his having advised or represented any client or client's cause.

3.14 No court or administrative authoirty shall refuse to recognize the right of a lawyer to appear before it for his client.

3.15 It is the duty of a lawyer to show proper respect towards the judiciary. He shall have the right to raise an objection to the participation or continued participation of a judge in a particular case, or to the conduct of a trial or hearing.

3.16 If any proceedings are taken against a lawyer for failing to show proper respect towards a court, no sanction against him shall be imposed by a judge who participated in the proceedings which gave rise to the charge against the lawyer.

3.17 Save as provided in these principles, a lawyer Shall enjoy civil and penal immunity for relevant statements made in good faith in written or oral pleadings, or in his professional appearances before a court, tribunal or other legal or administrative authority.

3.18 The independence of lawyers, in dealing with persons deprived of their liberty; shall be guaranteed so as to ensure that they have free and fair legal assistance. Safeguards shall be built to avoid any possible suggestions of collusion, arrangement or dependence between the lawyer who acts for them and the authorities.

3.19 Lawyers shall have all such other facilities and privileges as are necessary to fulfill their professional responsibilities effectively, including: a) absolute confidentiality of the lawyer-client relationship: b) the right to travel end to consult with their clients freely, both within their own country and abroad; c) the right freely to seek, to receive and, subject to the rules of their profession, to impart information and ideas relating to their professional work; d) the right to accept or refuse a client or a brief.

3.20 Lawyers shall enjoy freedom of belief, expression, association and assembly; and in particular they shall have the right to: a)take part in public discussion of matters concerning the law and the administration of justice. b) join Or forfreely local, national and international organizations c) promote and recommend well-considered law reforms in the public interest and inform the public about such matters, and d) take full and active part in the political, social and cultural life of their country.

3.21 Rules and regulations governing the fees and remunerations of lawyers shall be designed to ensure that they earn a lair and adequate income, and legal services are made available to the public on reasonable terms.

Legal Services for the Poor

3.22 it is a necessary corollary of the concept of an independent bar, that its members shall make their services available to all sectors of society, so that no one may be denied justice, and shall promote the cause of justice by protecting the human rights, economic, social and cultural, as well as civil and political, of individuals and groups.

3.23 Governments shall be responsible for providing sufficient funding for legal service programmes for the poor.

3.24 Lawyers engaged in legal service programmes and organizations, which are financed wholly:, or in part, from public funds, shall receive adequate remuneration and enjoy full guarantees of their professional independence in particular by:
- the direction of such programmes or organizations being entrusted to an independent board, composed mainly or entirely of members of the profession, with full control over its policies, budget and staff;
- recognition that, in serving the cause of justice, the lawyer primary duty is towards his client,: whom he must advise and represent in conformity with his professional conscience and judgment.

The Bar Association

3.25 There shall be established in each jurisdiction one or more independent and self-governing associations of lawyers recognized in law, whose council or other executive body shall be freely elected by all the members without interference of any kind by any other body or person. This shall be without prejudice to their right to form or join, in addition, other professional associations of lawyers and jurists.

3.26 In order to enjoy the right of audience before the courts, all lawyers shall be members of the appropriate Bar Association.

Function of the Bar Association

3.27 The functions of a Bar Association in ensuring the independence of the legal profession shall be inter alia:
a) to promote and uphold the cause of justice, without fear or favour;

b) to maintain the honour, dignity, integrity, competence, ethics, standards of conduct and discipline of the profession;
c) to defend the role of lawyers in .society and preserve the independence of the profession;
d) to protect and defend the dignity and independence of the judiciary;
e) to promote the free and equal access of the public to the system of justice, including the provision of legal aid: and advice;
f) to promote the right of everyone to a fair and public hearing before a competent, independent and impartial tribunal, and in accordance with proper procedures in all matters;
g) to promote and support law reform, and to comment upon and promote public discussion on the substance, interpretation and application of existing and proposed legislation;
h) to promote a high standard of legal education as a prerequisite for entry into the profession;
i) to ensure that there is free access to the profession for all persons having the requisite professional competence and good character, without discrimination of any kind, and to give assistance to new entrants into the profession;
j) to promote the welfare of members of the profession and render assistance to a member of his family in appropriate cases;
Q to affiliate with, and participate in, the activities of international organizations of lawyers.

3.28 Where a person involved in litigation wishes to engage a lawyer from another country to act with a local lawyer, the Bar Association shall cooperate in assisting the foreign lawyer to obtain the necessary right of audience.

3.29 To enable the Bar Association to fulfill its function of preserving the independence of lawyers, it shall be informed immediately of the reason and legal basis for the arrest or detention of any lawyer; and for the same purpose the association shall have prior notice for: t) any search of his person or property, ii) any seizure of documents in his possessions, and iii) any decision to .take or calling into question the integrity of a lawyer. In such cases, the Bar Association shall be entitled to be represented by its president or nominee, to follow the proceedings, and in particular to ensure that- professional secrecy is safeguarded.

Disciplinary Proceedings

3.30 The Bar Association shall freely establish and enforce, in accordance with the law, a code of professional conduct of lawyers.

3.31 . The Bar Association shall have exclusive competence to initiate and conduct disciplinary proceedings against lawyers on its own initiative or at the request of a litigant. Although no court or public authority shall itself take disciplinary proceedings against a lawyer, it may report a case to the Bar Association with a view to its initiating disciplinary proceedings.

3.32 Disciplinary proceedings shall be conducted in the first instance by a disciplinary committee established by the Bar Association.

3.33 An appeal shall lie from a decision of the disciplinary committee to an appropriate appellate body.
334 Disciplinary proceedings shall be conducted with full observance of the requirements of fair and proper procedure, in the light of the principles expressed in this declaration.

IV. Jurors
Selection of Prospective Jurors

4.01 The opportunity for jury service shall be extended without distinction of any kind by reason of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or status, subject however to citizenship requirements.

4.02 The names of prospective jurors shall be drawn from a jury source list compiled from one or more regularly maintained lists of persons residing in the court's jurisdiction.

4.03 The jury source list shall be representative, and shall be as inclusive of the adult population in the jurisdiction, as is feasible.

4.04 The Court shall periodically review the jury source list for its representativeness and inclusiveness. Should the Court determine that improvement is needed in the representativeness or inclusiveness of the jury source list, appropriate corrective action shall be taken.

4.05 Random selection procedures shall be used at all stages throughout the jury selection process except as provided herein.

4.06 The frequency and the length of time that persons are called upon to perform jury service and to be available therefor, shall be the minimum, consistent with the needs of justice.

4.07 All automatic excuses or exemptions from jury service shall be eliminated.

4.08 Eligible persons who are summoned may be excused from jury service only for valid reason by the court, or with its authorization.

Selection of a Particular Jury

4.09 Examination of prospective jurors determining whether to remove peremptory challenges. shall be limited to matters relevant to a juror for cause, and to exercising

4.10 if the judge determines during the examination of prospective jurors, that an individual is unable or unwilling to hear the particular ease at issue fairly and impartially, the individual shall be removed from the paneL Such a determination may be made on notion of a party or on the judge's own initiative.

4.11 In jurisdictions where peremptory challenges are permitted, their number and the procedure for exercising them shall be uniform for the same type of case.

4.12 Peremptory challenges shall be limited to a number no larger than necessary, to provide reasonable assurance of obtaining an unbiased jury.

Administration of the Jury System

4.13 The responsibility for administration of the jury system shall be under the control of the judiciary. understandable, and delivered sufficiently in advance.

4.15 Courts shall employ the services of prospective jurors, so as to achieve the best possible use of them with a minimum of inconvenience.

4.16 Courts shall provide adequate protection for jurors from threat and intimidation.

4.17 Courts shall provide an adequate and suitable environment for jurors, and jury facilities shall be arranged to minimize contact between jurors and parties, counsel and the public.

4.18 Persons called for jury service shall receive a reasonable allowance.

4.19 Employers shall be prohibited from penalizing employees who are called for jury service.

Jury Consideration and Deliberations

4.20 Procedures shall be provided to prevent a trial from being terminated because of unforeseen circumstances which would reduce the number of jurors.

4.21 Courts shall provide some form of orientation or instruction to persons called for jury service, to increase prospective jurors understanding of the judicial system, and prepare them to serve competently as jurors.

4.22 In simple language the trial judge shall: i) directly following empanelment of the jury, give preliminary explanations of the jury's role and of trial procedures; ii) prior to commencement of deliberations, direct the jury on the law.

4.23 A jury's deliberations shall be held in secrecy. Jurors shall not make public, reasons for their decisions.

a) A jury shall be sequestered only for the purpose of insulating its members from improper imformation or influence.
b) Standard procedures shall be promulgated to make certain that the inconvenience and discomfort of the sequestered jurors are minimized.

V. Assessors
Status

5.01 In defining assessor, the following shall be considered: In general, on certain judicial, quasi-judicial bodies or administrative tribunals, the assessor sits with a judge, magistrate or other jurist, to assist him in his duties. In most cases he is ..a person who does not necessarily have legal training, but who has some specific professional qualification or socio-economic expertise, that pertains to the subject-matter under consideration.

5.02 In some cases, the assessor shares with his legally-trained colleague, responsibility for the decision to be rendered: this then becomes a multi¬disciplinary judicial or quasi-judicial body.

Appointment

5.03 Unless he is selected by the parties unanimously, the assessor shall be appointed by a neutral authority not involved in the dispute.

5.04 Unless agreed upon by the parties or provided by law, the assessor shall be paid according to the decision of a neutral authority not involved in the dispute.

5.05 The assessor shall be selected for reasons of integrity and competence especially relevant to the matter to be considered by him.

5.06 The assessor shall enjoy a tenure which guarantees his independence; if he serves on a permanent basis he shall be guaranteed security, adequate remuneration and conditions of service.

5.07 Before commencing his duties, the assessor shall take an oath or affirmation of office.

Exercise of Mandate

5.08 In the decision-making process, the assessor shall be free from any order or instruction by the authority which has appointed him, by the parties or by the professional associations to which he belongs.

5.09 The assessor shall have the right to participate in the decision with complete freedom and independence in the area of his jurisdiction.

5.10 The assessor shall behave in such a manner as will maintain the dignity of his position and the impartiality and independence of justice.

5.11 The assessor shall not sit in a case where a reasonable apprehension of bias on his part may arise.

5.12 The. assessor shall be free to withdraw for generally accepted reasons.

Powers and Immunity

5.13 The assessor shall be vested with the authority, immunity and powers necessary to carry out his duties.

5.14 The assessor shall not be sued or harassed for acts and omissions in his official capacity.

Dismissal

5.15 The assessor shall not be dismissed in the course of his mandate except for incapacity or misbehaviour.

PRINCIPLES ON THE FUNDING AND RESOURCING OF THE JUDICIARY IN THE COMMONWEALTH

INTRODUCTION

The Commonwealth (Latimer House) Principles on the Accountability of and Relationship Between the Three Branches of Government[1] state:
"Each Commonwealth country's Parliaments, Executives and Judiciaries are the guarantors in their respective spheres of the rule of law, the promotion and protection of fundamental human rights and the entrenchments of good governance based on the highest standards of honesty, probity and Accountability".

In order to fulfil this responsibility, the judiciary must be institutionally independent. The provision of adequate financial resources and autonomy in finance and administration are fundamental to institutional independence. The proper funding and repair of the court estate, the provision of adequate computer systems and up to date software for courts and court users, and the provision of adequate numbers of judicial officers (judges and magistrates) and court staff help access to justice, the rule of law, and the independence of the judiciary.

Institutions need to be accountable for the funding allocated. However, any measures such as cost control mechanisms, performance indicators or algorithms which assess the numbers of cases cleared, the reduction of delays, etc…, whilst being useful tools, should not be depended on in the allocation of funding. These processes must not impact adversely on the independence of the judiciary or the quality of justice.

The Commonwealth Magistrates' and Judges' Association (CMJA) has been concerned with the funding of the Judiciary for many years. In order to safeguard the independence, integrity, and accountability of the judiciary, it is imperative that adequate resources are allocated to the judiciary. Whilst there may be reasons for budgetary constraints imposed by the Executive Branch, the judiciary must not be treated like a department of state but as the third arm of democracy. Limitations imposed on resources allocated to the Judiciary severely undermine the rule of law and access to justice. Sufficient resources must be allocated to the judiciary in order for it to manage its functions in an efficient and effective manner. Without adequate funding, access to justice and the right to a fair trial within a reasonable time limit may be jeopardised. The existence of an impartial, honest, and competent judiciary and the observance of the law are essential to economic growth and investment and is the right of every citizen.

The following principles are intended to provide a framework for the Legislature and Executive Branches of State in relation to the funding of the Judiciary and to assist in better understanding and supporting the judiciary in the fulfilment of their functions. They will also provide a guide to the Judiciaries of the Commonwealth in their requests for sufficient funding.

WHEREAS:

i. Principle IV of the Commonwealth (Latimer House) Principles of 2003 on the Three Branches of government states:
"Adequate resources should be provided for the judicial system to operate effectively without any undue constraints which may hamper the independence sought".

ii. The Commonwealth (Latimer House) Guidelines on Parliamentary Supremacy and Judicial Independence of 1999 annexed to the Principles state:
*"Funding
Sufficient and sustainable funding should be provided to enable the judiciary to perform its functions to the highest standards. Such funds, once voted for the judiciary by the legislature, should be protected from alienation or misuse. The allocation or withholding of funding should not be used as a means of exercising improper control over the judiciary.[2]

Appropriate salaries and benefits, supporting staff, resources and equipment are essential to the proper functioning of the judiciary.

As a matter of principle, judicial salaries and benefits should be set by an independent body and their value should be maintained". Chapter II (2).

iii. The UN Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary of 1985 state that:
"It is the duty of each Member State to provide adequate resources to enable the judiciary to properly perform its functions".

iv. The Limassol Conclusions on Combating Corruption in the Judiciary of 2002 recommended that "……. *governments should allocate sufficient resources to the courts to ensure their ability to provide an efficient, impartial and accessible service;" (*10 ix) and "to promote the recruitment and retention of persons of the requisite integrity and competence, Governments should ensure at all times that the remuneration of judicial officers is fixed at a level that will ensure that they enjoy financial security during their tenure of office and that upon retirement they continue to

[2] The Guidelines provide in the footnote to this article that "The provision of adequate funding for the Judiciary must be a very high priority in order to uphold the rule of law, to ensure that good governance and democracy are sustained and to provide for the effective and efficient administration of Justice. However, it is acknowledged that a shortfall in anticipated national income might lead to budgetary constraints. Finance ministries are urged to engage in appropriate consultations in order to set realistic and sustainable budgets which parliaments should approve to ensure adequate funds are available".

v. The Commonwealth Charter agreed by Heads of Government and signed by the Head of the Commonwealth in 2013 states: "We believe in the rule of law as an essential protection for the people of the Commonwealth and as an assurance of limited and accountable government. In particular we support an independent, impartial, honest, and competent judiciary and recognise that an independent, effective and competent legal system is integral to upholding the rule of law, engendering public confidence and dispensing justice" (VII- Rule of Law).

vi. The CMJA adopted a Resolution On The Lack Of Sufficient Resources Provided To The Courts At Its General Assembly In September 2015 In Wellington, New Zealand (see annex 1).

THE CMJA, REPRESENTING ITS MEMBERSHIP IN THE COMMONWEALTH, HAS RESOLVED TO ADOPT THE FOLLOWING PRINCIPLES:

1. INDEPENDENCE

Institutional independence of the Judiciary and the individual independence of each judge must be protected as the right of every citizen to a fair trial and to the protection of their human rights and fundamental freedoms. No cost cutting can be allowed to undermine judicial independence.

Decisions on the allocation of funds to the courts must be taken with the strictest respect for judicial independence.

The principal responsibility for court administration, including appointment, supervision and disciplinary control of administrative personnel and support staff must vest in the judiciary, or in a body in which the judiciary is represented and has an effective role.

2. ADEQUATE RESOURCES

Whilst budgets will always be subject to scrutiny by the Legislature, each state should allocate adequate resources, facilities and equipment to the courts to enable them to function in accordance with international standards and to enable judges to work efficiently without undue delay. This includes physical facilities appropriate for the maintenance of judicial independence, dignity and efficiency; judicial and administrative personnel; and operating budgets. Where economic constraints make it difficult to allocate to the court system facilities and resources which judges consider adequate to enable them to perform their functions, the essential maintenance of the rule of law and the protection of human rights require that the needs of the judiciary and the court system be accorded the highest level of priority in the allocation of resources.

The independence of the judiciary and the quality of justice will be compromised both directly or indirectly by reducing the financial resources allocated or by restricting the number of judicial officers and staff appointed to deal with increasing responsibilities and caseloads.

The Judiciary should have the authority, independent of the other branches of power, to prioritise the allocation of its resources and to define the prioritisation of use of such resources in line with a set of transparent criteria.

Courts should not be financed on the basis of discretionary decisions of official bodies but in a stable way on the basis of objective and transparent criteria. Funding of courts should not be subject to political fluctuations. No decision of the Legislature in relation to the Budget of the Judiciary should be reversed or diminished by the actions of the Executive Branch of State.

3. ROLE OF THE JUDICIARY IN THE BUDGETARY PROCESS

The budget of the Judiciary should be prepared by the courts or a competent authority in collaboration with the courts at all stages in the budgetary process. The Judiciary should have an opportunity to express its views about any proposed budget directly to the Legislature and having regard to the needs of the independence of the judiciary and its administration. The best approach is for a senior member of the national Judiciary in each country to appear before a Legislative Committee established for the purpose of determining an appropriate amount of funding for the Judiciary. The Committee should then advise the Legislature of the amount of the budget appropriation necessary to fund the Judicial branch for the upcoming year. The amount allotted should be sufficient to enable each court to function at the highest of standards and with sufficient judges to avoid delays.

In order to meet the expectations of society, the judicial budget should include resources to innovate and modernise in line with the development of information technology, but with due regard to providing continued access to justice by the public as well as open justice.

The maintenance of the rule of law requires long-term financial stability in the funding of the judiciary. Courts should not be funded only on an annual basis but should have the certainty of longer-term financial budgets. Funding of courts should be protected from fluctuations caused by political instability.

Judges should receive appropriate training in order to fulfil their administrative and financial responsibilities and have the necessary support to carry out this task.

4. REMUNERATION

The remuneration of judges must remain at all times commensurate with their professional responsibilities, public duties and the dignity of their office. Judges' remuneration should be sufficient to shield them from inducements aimed at influencing their decisions. Remuneration must be entrenched constitutionally or guaranteed in law so as to preserve judicial independence and impartiality. All discussions and negotiations relating to judicial remuneration should involve the judiciary.

The salaries and emoluments (such as, and including, benefits and pensions) of the judiciary should not be altered to the disadvantage after their appointment. A reduction in the remuneration and pensions or deterioration in working conditions of judges is likely to adversely affect the quality and the independence of the judiciary as well as adversely affect the recruitment and retention of suitably qualified persons as judges and should therefore be avoided.

The remuneration should be based on independently set standards that rely on objective and transparent criteria, not on an assessment of the individual performance as a judge.

There should be provisions for the periodic review of judges' remuneration by an independent body to overcome or minimise the effect of inflation. Recommendations by the independent body should be accepted by the Executive.

Judges should receive pensions after their retirement, which should be adequate and should be in a reasonable relationship to their level of remuneration when working to avoid any ethical challenges that might arise if they were considering returning to private practice as lawyers.

5. TRAINING

All budgets should include provision for judicial training including international, regional and local training. Proper training promotes high quality and prompt judicial decisions, which themselves strengthen predictability and legal certainty. The body responsible for judicial training, should be autonomous and have its own budget. The body responsible for judicial training should be under the supervision of the Judiciary.

6. ACCESS TO JUSTICE AND CONFIDENCE IN AN INDEPENDENT JUDICIARY

No budgetary constraints should be imposed with a view to restricting access to justice by members of the public. No increase in court fees should disenfranchise the public's access to justice.

The public must be confident in the independence and integrity of the judiciary and if they are aware that adequate resources are not being allocated, there is a risk that the judiciary will be seen as a pawn of the state. Any budgetary constraints must be explained in a transparent way.

Annex 1

"RESOLUTION ON THE LACK OF SUFFICIENT RESOURCES PROVIDED TO THE COURTS
Adopted at the CMJA General Assembly September 2015, Wellington, New Zealand

Noting that jurisprudence and international conventions recognise that institutional independence is one of the fundamental pillars of judicial independence,

Noting that in every Commonwealth country there are pressures to reduce the cost of providing justice,

Noting that courts are expected to deliver results faster and with fewer resources, and

Noting that there is an ever increasing tension between governments who have the responsibility to fund the administration of justice and the courts that have the obligation to deliver justice,

Whereas, Paragraph IV of the Commonwealth (Latimer House) Principles on the Three Branches of Government states that adequate resources should be provided for the judicial system to operate, The Commonwealth Magistrates' and Judges' Association notes with concern the continued lack of sufficient resources provided to the courts in many Commonwealth countries,

Therefore, the General Assembly of the Commonwealth Magistrates' and Judges' Association records that the provision of sufficient resources to the courts is a fundamental constitutional obligation of the Executive branch of government".

SENATE OF CANADA

Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs

Issue 32 - Evidence

OTTAWA, Wednesday, September 30, 1998

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill C-37, to amend the Judges Act and to make consequential amendments to other Acts, met this day at 3:37 p.m. to give consideration to the bill.

Senator Lorna Milne (Chairman) in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: We have before us Mr. David Scott, the author of the 1995 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits.

We await your comments with some interest, Mr. Scott.

Mr. David Scott, Chair, 1995 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits: I wish to reaffirm that I am one of the authors of this report. The other two authors are Michel Vennat, a distinguished lawyer with Stikeman Elliot in Montreal, and Barbara Rae, a very distinguished businesswoman from Vancouver. Ms Rae was an enormous resource for us, because she brought her background in personnel management to the job without the baggage of a connection to the judiciary. Since I have spent all of my life in the courts, I have a certain amount of baggage about the judiciary.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Your report is very interesting. I have a question about page 28 of your report, where you recommend that the Judges Act provide for the payment of a lifetime annuity to a common law spouse under legally applicable circumstances. I don't have any trouble with the whole question of paying out pensions, because that comes under section 100 of the Constitution. Everything is fine from that point of view.

When it comes to common law spouses, what do you mean by, "we recommend that the Judges Act allow for payments to a common law spouse, under legally applicable circumstances."

[English]

Does this refer to provincial law or to federal law? What do you mean by that?

Mr. Scott: We mean legal situations in which a person qualifies as a common-law spouse, which assumes a certain period of cohabitation. Our intent was not to define any circumstances in particular, but rather to take common-law spouses who had established rights in accordance with provincial law in all of the provinces, and to carry that forward for the benefit of the common-law spouses of judges.

Senator Beaudoin: Some of my colleagues will return to the issue of a common-law spouse.

Senator Murray: It is assumed that both parties to the common-law union are legally free to marry; that is to say, not married to someone else.

Mr. Scott: Let me begin by saying that I am not a family law lawyer. However, I do not think that the definition of a common-law spouse assumes freedom to marry. If I understand your question, you are saying that if the person is already married, he or she is incapable of being a common-law spouse.

Senator Murray: Well, he or she is certainly incapable or legally marrying someone else.

Mr. Scott: I could be quite wrong, but I do not think that precludes someone from being a common-law spouse. In my understanding such a person can qualify as a common-law spouse.

Senator Beaudoin: Let us return to the first question on the commission. I do not have any problem with the commission as such. Whether we like it or not, the fact is that the Supreme Court has already said that, in order to protect judicial independence, we need an organization such as the commission. I know that Mr. Justice La Forest is dissenting on this, but the majority of the court is of the opinion that to have judicial independence we need a commission such as this one.

What is your opinion on this? I understand that the report is not binding on the legislative and the executive branches, but that if Parliament or the government disagrees, they must justify themselves, and even in court if necessary.

Did you study that problem for your report?

Mr. Scott: Senator, as a result of reading some of the debates which were held here, the only thing that alarmed me somewhat was the suggestion from some witnesses that the triennial commission system works fine and that we should stick with it.

My colleagues and I were in complete agreement that the triennial commission system not only did not work well, but that it did not work at all. It might have looked very appealing, but nothing ever happened. We felt very strongly that it became, as we said in our report, a mechanism that allowed the government of the day to do nothing about the judges, because doing something about the judges is a very unpopular thing.

The discussion that we are now having is most unique. Previously, no one wanted to do anything for the judges because people believe that judges were well looked after. That is, they have tenure and pensions and everything else, so there is no reason no bother with them. Politically, it is very unappetizing to be preoccupied with judges.

When we were appointed and began our work, we read what had happened before. Every previous commission had said that the system did not work. The government not take up any of the meaningful ideas for reform in terms of issues such as pay and allowances, nor did it take up any of the suggestions for reforming the triennial commission system. The thrust of our report is that this must be fixed.

Luckily, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the P.E.I. case came along at the same time. We certainly were not anticipating that, nor would we have developed any such notion, although I would defend it. We felt that the government should be forced to react to the views of the triennial commission. Further, we felt that it should be forced to table a bill; that the government should be forced to do something in order to legitimize the process of inviting citizens to take part in this lengthy study and then allowing it to drift off before a committee and disappear.

The most important thing to me is for this committee and anyone charged with responsibility to recognize that the triennial commission system does not work.

As I understand it, the bill does not provide for what the commission suggested, which was a requirement to table the bill -- and I understand that that may be an unrealistic expectation -- but that the government will have to respond in some way. Therefore we now have this overlay from the court, and the whole process will be subject to judicial review and the test will be rationality.

I confess that I read the very impressive statements before you from the law professors. I am not nearly as alarmed about it as they are. Constitutional substance aside, I believe that a test of rationality for a commission report such as this one will be a very easy threshold for the government of the day to meet. If it cannot meet rationality, then, constitutional imperatives aside, what is wrong with the notion that the court advanced?

As a member of this commission, I believe that something must be done to fix this problem. The bill goes a certain way to fixing it. The Supreme Court overlay is another question.

Senator Beaudoin: I understand your point of view, and I have great respect for it. The question is, what happens if the government does not like it? A strong majority of the court said that the executive and the legislative branches must justify their points of view. At the end, if there is what in French is called une impasse, then the court may rule on the basis of rationality.

Mr. Scott: Should the government be told that it has to give reasons? The judges do not like to be told that they have to give reasons, so for the judges to tell Parliament that they have to give reasons may be a bit offensive.

The bottom line is that it is a rationality test, and I am not nearly as alarmed about that as others are.

Senator Joyal: We have tried to understand the fundamental changes to the principle of our Constitution stemming from this proposal in Bill C-37. To put the issue simply, section 100 of the Constitution vested the responsibility to ensure appropriate compensation for judges in the Parliament of Canada. The triennial commission did not produce a satisfactory result in a reasonable period of time. It seems to us that, in the judges' opinions, we ought to go to the other extreme whereby Parliament abandons its responsibility to have the final say in the vote for the appropriation to pay the salaries. In my opinion this is wrong. It is one thing to say that Parliament filibustered, but to amend the system by including a time frame within it so that there is an end result, either in the affirmative or in the negative, is the proper way to manage Parliament's responsibility. I can understand that and I think a reasonable citizen can understand that.

What goes beyond common sense is that the commission has no parameters to decide what constitutes a proper increase. The bill contains no criteria that defines the scope of the commission to decide upon what is a fair increase for whatever reasons they think are just. The other problem is that if the government does not give effect to the recommendations of the House of Commons or the Senate committee, or its own financial policies criteria, then the court might decide that there is litigation and the government must justify its decision in the court. We are both judges and parties in a decision like that. That is where the fine-tuning of the solution that is proposed to us must be investigated.

You have spent a lot of time with learned peoples to study the compensation for judges. Is it the same way in other countries -- that is, do the judges have the last word on their pay increase and must the governments in those countries abide by commission reports because they do not have the capacity to say "No"? In Canada, the government civil service and the armed forces, among others, have had their salaries frozen. Judges are like other people; they make an effort. I am not against an increase in salaries at all. In fact, judges are underpaid in my opinion. However, in order not to go to the other extreme, we must protect the principles in the new system that we are putting into place. Can we not find a middle balance compared to what existed before, which did not produce a satisfactory result for the learned justices? Can we go the other way? There might be another way to fine-tune this.

Mr. Scott: The way you divide it out is the way to divide it. The decision of the court that the judges will have the last word on their salaries is one question; the whole question of the government having to meet a rationality test as proposed by the court is another question.

As far as the commission is concerned and the analysis of what is appropriate compensation, this has a historical base. Before 1981, there was no independent assessment of any kind. The triennial commission was established by statute as the basis of getting some independent input for Parliament about what is appropriate. Criteria for that would not be a good idea. How would you establish it? Would there be limits? No. The commission -- that is, assuming that it is appropriately selected in terms of make-up -- should be able to free-wheel in terms of what they think should happen. They then make a report. Up to that point, we have an appropriate historical basis for doing this.

What happens next? In our brief, we say that instead of nothing happening, something must happen.

Senator Moore: Within a set time-frame?

Mr. Scott: Yes. Otherwise, it is a screen of some design. Something must happen.

I accept the proposition that under the Constitution, Parliament will decide. Parliament should have the last word. We are talking about the mechanism for ensuring that something happens. This bill, which does not go as far as we hoped it would, says that within a fixed period of time government must react with a position statement. The court is saying that they must give reasons and the court will have this judicial review power. Whether or not people find that desirable is an interesting question. The court has spoken, so what happens next?

The task here is to fix on the nature of the commission, its make-up and its jurisdiction. It is important that that not get lost in the minds of some who are outraged about what the judges are doing to the vehicle of this judgment. I am more interested in what happens down the road and having a workable, practical commission that does the job.

Senator Joyal: I totally agree with you, as do some of my colleagues around the table, when you talk about a time-frame and trying to establish some kind of compelling agenda so that we arrive at the end of that process to have it resolved. That is a common understanding.

I have a slight reservation about your statement that you do not want criteria. Even the Supreme Court of Canada said that the commission should have some criteria. The judgment of the majority of the court was that the body must convene if a fixed period of time has elapsed since its last report in order to consider the inadequacy of judges' salaries in light of the cost of living and other relevant factors. Even the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that there must be some factors.

We cannot abandon to a commission the overall open-ended door to say, "Let us discuss whether or not we must increase judges' salaries." Perhaps judges in Australia had an increase last year. Our judges may say, "We work as hard as them, so we should have the same increase." There must be some criteria. Treasury Board negotiates with the union and they have criteria. The Government of Quebec will open negotiations with teachers, with unions, and with all the other services. They have some criteria such as equity, pay, and a lot of other principles that they want to implement.

It does not hurt my sense of democracy or fairness with judges if the commission is bound to follow specific criteria rather than offering us a general report that judges are nice people who are learned and forego part of their freedom to live in society because they are seen as symbols of rectitude, and so on. We all know that.

Let us frame the mandate of the commission so that Parliament has a fair perception that those people are not just looking for any kind of increase -- especially if we bound them to have a result at the end of the road. It is one thing to have everything on one side and nothing on the other side. I think it is a fair balance of the two. Even the court has recognized that.

Mr. Scott: I am not disagreeing with you. I am not saying that the commission should function arbitrarily. I am not sure how much needs to be said. The court said, "and other relevant criteria." Will we now statutorily define the criteria? These previous triennial commissions -- and let us exclude ours for the moment -- followed the same process, namely, analyzing what salaries were in the private sector, what they were in the practising bar, and what they were in the government. They were then compared, as were the cost-of-living increases. That is the relevant criteria.

If you talk about hard criteria, such as whether the judges' salaries should be measured against the salaries of civil servants, our American friends are in the process of trying to disengage that right now. There is a kind of lock-step arrangement there and they are trying to eliminate it. I am not saying that there should not be any criteria, but once you start down the road of developing criteria, you may create a monster. These commissions should take into account all the relevant factors -- certainly not irrelevant factors or arbitrary factors. You would not confine it to cost-of-living increases, although it would be a logical thing to consider. I am not sure what the relevant criteria would be.

Senator Joyal: When you did your report, you followed a certain number of criteria. What are they?

Mr. Scott: Those were exactly the criteria that anyone would use to complete this task. No one provided us with criteria. The criteria were: what the judges are making now, what they made previously, what they are making elsewhere, what groups comparable to them are making, and the judges' situation. The problem of what to consider was not a large one. The process of determining what to consider was important, but we were not stuck on it.

We were stuck on the question of whether we should be bound by some public service compensation level. That has been a traditional debate in these commissions. However, that aside, I do not think there was much problem deciding what to consider.

Senator Bryden: It is my understanding that under the bill the recommendation of government, based on the commission's report, will be presented to Parliament and enacted by Parliament. Is that correct?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Senator Bryden: It is also my understanding that there are at least two places where the court now says clearly that it can intervene. First, it can intervene if the commission itself, like any other administrative tribunal, is alleged to have gone outside its jurisdiction. In such a case, it can quash the decision reached by the commission. The court probably cannot substitute its own position, but it can ask the commission to take the matter up again. That is the normal administrative law procedure.

The courts appear to be taking the position that, if the government acts on the commission's report and someone says that the government has made an irrational decision, that person can make an application to the court for a judicial review of the government's decision. That review could, in a proper case, allow for the quashing of that decision. Is that true?

Mr. Scott: Yes. My understanding is that the theme of the judgment is that the rationality test is tied to undermining independence. In other words, the basis for going this route is the question of preserving independence. I do agree with what you have said, however.

Senator Bryden: I do not want to bring in "the ubiquitous reasonable man," which is where the rationality test takes us, but I would like to go one step further.

The commission makes its recommendation, which is accepted by the government. The government drafts a bill and presents it to Parliament. Parliament debates the bill and rejects it. On the independence test under the Constitution, is it possible for an application to be made to a judge to quash the act of Parliament because it is in violation of the Constitution Act, which gives independence to judges?

Mr. Scott: Forgive me, because I am the furthest thing from a parliamentarian. If Parliament rejects the bill, however, is there an act of Parliament at all?

Senator Bryden: Let me just vary the question a bit. Let us say that the act of Parliament is passed, but it grants the judges only $1.

The concern that some of us have is that, after documents such as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Parliament has been allowed to keep very few real parliamentary rights vis-à-vis the courts. The time when Parliament was supreme went out the window with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Parliament has always jealously guarded its right to appropriate taxes -- the citizens' dollars.

That is what is troubling a number of us. Are the courts now saying, under the guise of protecting the independence of the judiciary, that the judiciary can override decisions made at the parliamentary level, and say that a particular judgment is irrational and interferes with the constitutional independence of the judiciary?

Mr. Scott: I believe that is what is being said. I will come to the reasons for that in a moment. If the government tables a bill that is not highly recommended by the commission, and the bill becomes law, it is my understanding that the case is saying that the courts, on judicial review, can intervene. That is a bit of a misnomer in terms of judicial review, because it would be questioning the constitutionality of a statute. However, that is the way the court would intervene. It would be confronted with this statute, and it would be exactly the same if the government proposed that the recommendations be followed and Parliament rejected it. I believe that you have analyzed that correctly. I may have this wrong, but that is my reading of it.

What happens if Parliament passes a bill which is deliberately drafted with a view to controlling the behaviour of judges by attacking them economically? What happens if the commission says that the judges have not had a pay raise for 40 years and they are on the poverty lines, yet Parliament attempts to further reduce their salaries? What mechanism do we have to deal with that?

Senator Bryden: The answer to your question is that you would get another Parliament. In a democracy, the final arbiter used to be the people who elected the parliamentarians and if the parliamentarians acted that ridiculously, the parliamentarians got voted out of office.

I hope I am not over-simplifying this, but the concern is that, in addition to all the other powers that now reside in the Supreme Court, we will now give the justices the power to tax. That is, they will be in a position to reject Parliament's decision that the people of Canada cannot afford to do a certain thing, even though it was recommended by the commission and by the government, and to increase the amount of money allocated for judges. We can go through this whole process and have the court says that the result is not acceptable.

Do the justices then fix the amount, or do they do the normal thing, which is to say, "Go back and try again"?

Mr. Scott: I think they say, "Go back and try again."

Senator Bryden: That is of real concern to many of us who grew up believing that Parliament had some power.

Mr. Scott: I understand that, and I suppose it depends upon one's point of view. I look at it entirely from the point of view of the independence of the judiciary. To take a far-fetched example, if a Parliament duly elected by the citizenry concluded that the judiciary was out of control and that therefore Parliament would undermine it economically, it would be modest comfort only to know that the Governor General might not sign the bill into law, or that we could have an election. Presumably, by this time Parliament is uttering the will of the people.

I understand what you are saying. I understand the concern.

I would be very surprised if the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, and their numbers who supported this notion, contemplated it extending as far as you have described it.

Senator Bryden: I am sure they did not. We are here to try to make sure that we understand all the implications of what is being stated here.

It bothers me as an individual that this is the only time in 130 years that, to preserve the independence of our judiciary, the Supreme Court is requesting the right to review. It was never required before. Why is it necessary, all of a sudden, at this stage?

The Chairman: To follow up in the same area, if the court quashed a bill of this nature, they would not then have the power to tax, because what would stand at that point would be the previous bill, would it not?

Senator Bryden: Quashing it means that we must try it again.

Mr. Scott: It means that the existing regime would continue.

Senator Bryden: It is an indirect ability, because they could go back and say, "Add another 10 and another 10 until we get something that is acceptable."

If the judges rule and say that they will quash the bill for Constitutional reasons, does the notwithstanding clause then come into effect, or is there no ability for it to operate in that situation?

Mr. Scott: No, it does not come into effect in that situation.

Senator Murray: The process that is provided for in this bill is that the commission submits its report and the Minister of Justice is obliged to table it in each of the Houses of Parliament within 10 days, effectively. The report must then be referred to this committee, to the Senate, and to our counterparts in the House of Commons. They have 90 sitting days to report their findings. It then says that "the Minister of Justice shall respond to a report within six months after receiving it."

Are we certain that the obligation is there is for the Minister of Justice to respond to the commission's report or to the parliamentary committee? If you look at the marginal notes on page 4 there is "Report by Committee," "Definition of `sitting day'," and then "Response to report." I ask the question because it is quite normal under the rules in the House of Commons that the government is obliged to respond to reports of parliamentary committees within a certain period of time. We do not have a similar rule in the Senate.

I am not aware that ministers or the government are obliged by statute to respond to reports of other commissions, although they may be obliged to do so.

Mr. Scott: The intent is that the minister respond to the report of the commission. Whether that is regarded by senators as desirable or otherwise, I believe that is the intent. That is because we, and a succession of commissions before us, were of the view that the government should be required to respond rather than simply say nothing. That is my understanding, but I could be wrong.

Senator Murray: We should probably ask the minister.

The Chairman: That is a good question to ask the representatives of the department when they return here.

Mr. Scott: I think that is correct.

Senator Beaudoin: In the same line as the one taken by Senator Bryden, is it true that if the government is resisting the commission's recommendation, the government may have to justify its stand? If I understand the bill correctly, it means that the burden of evidence is on the shoulders of the legislated branch of the state. It is not often that we have that, but it is there. The court ruled on this in the provincial court judges reference.

However, the court may intervene only if it is not rational. That is the way I read the statute. It does not mean -- and I would object strongly to this -- that the court itself would fix the salaries. That would be quite unacceptable. I cannot see how we can go that far.

What is your understanding of this? In other words, the court may say: Your refusal is not rational. That means you must try again.

Mr. Scott: That is correct.

Senator Beaudoin: That does not mean more, which is quite something.

Mr. Scott: As Senator Beaudoin says, it is quite something.

Senator Beaudoin: At least the power of the court is on the irrationality, not on the question of taxation or things of that sort. I know it is close.

Mr. Scott: Rightly or wrongly, it is on rationality as measured by the undermining of independence. It is not economic rationality or some other rationality. I could be wrong, but that is the way I read the judgment. The court is concerned only with the issue of independence, so the rationality is at issue.

Senator Beaudoin: What was raised by Senator Bryden is that the last word is given to a court in a court case.

Mr. Scott: Yes, but it is not given to them to fix their salaries.

Senator Beaudoin: It is not to fix the salaries, so it means to try it again?

Mr. Scott: That is correct.

Senator Beaudoin: The court was not unanimous, but they do not need to be unanimous on this. There was a strong majority to that effect in the court.

Mr. Scott: That is correct.

Senator Beaudoin: We cannot go further than that on that precise question. We may like it or dislike it, but the fact is that there is already one advisory opinion of the court that says that the mechanism of a commission is good. We must abide by the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I cannot see how we may use the notwithstanding clause in this because it is not a Charter case. It is a basic principle of the Canadian Constitution that is judicial independence. This is a difficult debate. The legislative area and the judiciary have been separate in Canada for 300 years. It is one of the basic principles of our Constitution. However, in a case like this it is a bit technical. I am glad that we must solve an interesting question like that.

Senator Sparrow: Let us say that there were no recommendations in the report that the status quo be maintained. What would happen then?

You suggested that that report must go to Parliament. If there was a status quo, you suggest that it still must go to Parliament with no changes. If they did in some way or other go to the house, the judge would determine whether Parliament had made an irrational decision.

Could the irrational decision have been made by the commission? That recommendation had gone, and now the government -- Parliament -- backed that decision, and it was irrational in both cases? Does the court still decide that the commission was irrational, as well as Parliament? If in fact there was no report, could that be considered an irrational decision because there was no recommendation for any changes?

Mr. Scott: I think that Senator Bryden's point is the correct one. If the commission exceeds its jurisdiction by irrationality, if that is possible, then judicial review would lie anyway.

My sense of the rationality here at issue is the government's response to the commission's report rather than the commission's report itself. In other words, the point of the independent commission is that it will be an independent adviser to government, and the concern is that governments are arbitrarily ignoring it. If the commission itself, by its methodology or what it says, is demonstrably irrational or lacks in jurisdiction or whatever, I believe that judicial review would lie anyway, whatever this case provides.

The irrationality or rationality is in the government's reaction to the commission's report. That is what I understand the Supreme Court of Canada is dealing with in the P.E.I. case.

Senator Sparrow: But if both decisions were irrational, in the opinion of a judge, what then?

Mr. Scott: I suppose that if the commission's decision were irrational to a level which merited judicial review, that would be the first step. Obviously, if the judges were challenging it, the first step is to either be supporting the commission's decision or attacking it. This is all premised on the proposition, as I appreciate it, that this independent commission will make a rational recommendation that will be arbitrarily rejected by government.

[Translation]

Senator Pépin: According to clause 45, a judge who is in receipt of an annuity can leave his pension to his common law spouse whom he has lived with for at least one year. Some people have pointed out to us that in most provinces, the requirement is three year's cohabitation. Could you explain this to us?

[English]

Mr. Scott: I have read what has been said to your committee about this. Certainly, three years is the provincial standard in many jurisdictions. I am not an expert in this area so I will be of no use to you. However, my understanding is that this is an expression of the regime in place in other areas. However, I have no idea whether this is a departure or whether this is an expression of the statutory regime in place in the provinces. I am just not on top of this. My recollection was that it was three years, but obviously this one-year provision is defensible based on the survivors' benefits, which do not apply to judges. I am sorry that I am of no help.

Senator Beaudoin: Someone said that this bill is harmonizing the situation of judges with that of people in other areas of the public service, such as the RCMP.

The Chairman: I believe that it is harmonizing it with the public service.

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, and even members of Parliament.

The Chairman: Yes. We will hear from another witness who is knowledgeable in this area. We can ask the question again then.

Senator Joyal: Did you study how other common-law systems comparable to Canada deal with this issue of judges' compensation to protect the principle of the judiciary's independence?

Mr. Scott: We did. While walking here from my office, I was wondering where our research papers had gone. They have all gone back to the judicial affairs centre and I will see if I can find them.

We did a study of that. As I am sure you have been told, in some Australian states they have negative resolution. I believe they have that in New South Wales. In others, they have commissions that have powers to recommend only. I could not list them for you, but the one most aggressively favourable to the judges is the negative resolution system, which is in place in New South Wales, Australia. The report is tabled and if there is no bill rejecting it, it becomes law.

Senator Joyal: Do you know the system in the U.K. generally?

Mr. Scott: I cannot recollect it. We did a study of that, but I cannot now remember what we learned. I will find out and send it up to the clerk.

Senator Joyal: I should like to come back to the question of rationality. As you realize, it is something that bothers us a lot. You say that the test would be rationality in reference with the maintenance of independency of the judiciary.

Let us take an example that we have experienced in the last years. We were in a difficult economic situation in terms of budgetary issues in Canada and the government decided to institute freezes all over the place. The judges were frozen, too, in terms of compensation.

Let us imagine that some time in the future the same situation arises and the government once again institutes freezes. The commission studies the workload of the judges and concludes that their workload has increased and they request a 2 per cent increase, which seems reasonable in a difficult time. However, the committees of the House of Commons and the Senate recommend against the commission's request, as does the Minister of Justice.

In such a context, where everyone is hit, where, in your opinion, does the maintenance of the rationality principle in relation to the independency of the judiciary stand?

Mr. Scott: A freeze across the board is rational. However, the judges did not always think that. It is very interesting what the Chief Justice said in the P.E.I. case. He said that a freeze across the board, although effectively a reduction, would be defensible.

The judges did not always think that. They did not like to be aligned with the executive branch of government, so they did not like to be swept in with other public servants. In respect of this last freeze, there was a lot of criticism on the part of the judges.

I read in the judgment that the chief justice acknowledges that an across-the-board freeze, where everyone bears the burden, would be rational. I regard that as an advance in judicial thinking. It would be rational, but the question is: What would be irrational? I am not sure of the answer to that question. I suppose that is part of the troubling nature of the problem, because what would be irrational in the face of what is perceived in society as unwarranted judicial activism is a massive reduction in compensation affecting only judges. The judges might regard that as an obvious attempt to undermine their independence and to control their behaviour.

Cases such as the one in P.E.I. have involved efforts include some independence problem associated with salaries. It arose from the fact that the executive branch set the salaries for judges, and the judges had no say whatsoever in the matter. There is always an effort to get the hook of independence into the question. That is why it is not just rationality per se, but rationality as tested by the stability of the independence of the judiciary.

Senator Joyal: On the same basis of your answer, a judge would recognize that when an effort is requested from everyone, it ought to be borne fairly by the judiciary, too. They are part of society as such.

Why are people so reluctant to have the criteria that the commission would follow mirror the criteria that Treasury Board follows when putting forward proposals that are within the framework of the government purse? Essentially, that is what Treasury Board must do when putting together a proposal for the unions. It would seem to be in accordance with the capacity of the taxpayers to pay at this point in time.

Mr. Scott: Perhaps I am pushing this point too far. I am not saying that there should not be any criteria, but at a certain point the criteria become developed enough that you do not need an independent commission. That is, you need only apply the criteria. You could say that the remuneration for the judiciary should be measured by the salaries of deputy ministers or by the incomes or benefits received by deputy ministers. That is the end of it.

I believe in the notion that for the judiciary, who are independent of government, there should be some mechanism for determining what is appropriate in terms of compensation.

I am not saying that we do not need criteria. What I am saying is that we need to determine the nature of the criteria. Will we consider the benefits received by deputy ministers? If so, at what levels? If you get to that point, then you do not need an independent commission, do you?

Senator Joyal: In the United States they have criteria, and they fix the level of compensation to avoid that kind of discretionary involvement of elected people, thereby protecting the independence of the judiciary.

When you put forward some criteria, is that not a way to contain the independence of the judiciary? In that situation you apply the criteria and then there is no discussion.

Mr. Scott: Except for the fact that such a solution presumes that criteria provide the complete answer. There is some judgment in here somewhere, and where there is judgment there is an opportunity to lobby for the judgment to go one way or the other. The way we get into this area is that judges cannot lobby; therefore, you must have an independent commission.

In the United States, there is an enormous boon from removing the link between judges' salaries and bureaucrats' salaries. That is not entirely the work of the judiciary. There is a feeling that the judiciary, as a separate branch of government, should be dealt with separately. The criteria change from time to time, depending upon the attractions of the bench. About four years ago, it was much more attractive to consider an appointment to the bench than it is now. People flocked to be appointed to the bench over the last 10 years. Before that, they did not do so, and they certainly are not doing so now.

You are trying to develop a system that matches what is available outside the judiciary in order to attract the right people. I would not favour simply establishing a set of criteria that says that judges will be treated like a certain group of people with all the same criteria. If you do that, you do not need an independent commission.

Senator Joyal: You said that there is a movement in the United States to deregulate the compensation mechanism for judges. Is that not a way for those people who fight for judicial activism to submit judges to the appreciation of discretionary compensation decisions?

Mr. Scott: The first group pushing for the removal of such a linkage is the judges. They feel that their situation and the need to attract the right people to the judiciary will not be addressed by putting them into a category with federal public servants and that, since they are a separate branch of government, they should be dealt with separately. The motives of others is another question, but that is a hot topic in the U.S. now.

Senator Joyal: I understand your point. Besides the cost of living index, the economic growth of Canada, and the objective that the government is pursuing in its budgetary policy involving salaries, you add the criteria of putting enough money on the table so that there will be enough candidates interested in the profession.

Mr. Scott: Yes, the right candidates.

Senator Joyal: In other words, we must make the package attractive enough to attract those we want to have, and not those who are looking for another job because they feel they are underpaid. Is that what you have in mind?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

The Chairman: I am rather surprised, Mr. Scott, to hear you say that this is not a position that people are avidly seeking. Most members of Parliament would be surprised to hear that, too.

Mr. Scott: But are they the right people? That is the question. From sea to sea, we have had a tremendous judiciary in this country. In my province of Ontario, the Court of Appeal has always had the top lawyers in the profession. This is not true in other countries. In other countries, the judiciary is frequently made up of people who have been appointed to the bench early in their lives. There is a completely different atmosphere in the judiciary. I make no apology for pushing hard for the idea that there should be enough independence in the effort to assess what judges should be paid to attract the right people. The right people are not necessarily Bay Street people, but people from communities across the country. We need to have the top people in the judiciary.

Senator Lawson: On the issue of criteria, I agree with Mr. Scott. I think it would be a serious mistake to try to have fixed criteria. I heard Senator Joyal say that the Treasury Board has some criteria, and I am sure that the executive board does. Every union does, but it is floating, flexible criteria that works on each individual occasion. You keep the ones which work, and if they do not work next time, you change them to meet the changing circumstances.

I have been involved in negotiations for over 40 years and I have learned that it is impossible to have fixed, rigid criteria. One or two criteria are obvious, such as the cost of living, but you simply cannot work within a strict framework.

Those parties with bargaining rights have flexible criteria. To attempt to apply it in this situation would be impossible. I agree with you that there is no point in having a commission if you are to have rigid criteria. Rather, it should be binding arbitration or binding conciliation, as it was in the old days: Fix it and leave it, with no appeal.

Mr. Scott: I do not think that a lot of people genuinely believe that there is a problem in attracting the right people to the bench. However, in reality, the opposite is true. We have some of the most wonderful people on the bench. Yet, every once in a while you get a rush of people who want to be judges and you see a hint of the other side of the coin, which is very unappealing. You see people who want to be judges because they perceive it to be easier work and because they are attracted by the pension, et cetera. Those people we positively do not want. They end up losing their spirit for it in no time at all, and the result is a disaster.

However, taking the point about the criteria, we do always have to be measuring how we compensate our judges against that body of people from which we are drawing to ensure that we are competitive. We obviously do not pay anything like the incomes that are given up, but we must pay enough to ensure that it will not be such an enormous step down that people will not do it.

Senator Bryden: It is interesting that the tremendous courts that we all know and have practised before have all come about without this type of protection. I do not know why we have to go further with it at this particular time. There was an old saying in law school that A students make professors, B students make judges, and C students make money.

As you know, the fact that a given lawyer is making $500,000 a year doing estates and commercial law in no way indicates that he is better than the carefully practising lawyer, even an independent practitioner, who is eking out enough to pay his secretary and his overhead and clear $80,000 or $100,000.

Mr. Scott: That is so.

Senator Bryden: I should like to go back to the issue of criteria or guidelines. Senator Lawson and I have both been in the labour business for a long time. The ability to go to economic warfare is in some instances removed in the public interest. For example, firefighters and sometimes police have the right to strike removed from them and replaced by arbitration.

In most statutes that make arbitration the final decision-maker, there are criteria laid out. If there are not criteria, you cannot take into account the employers' ability to pay. Therefore, the fact that the Province of Prince Edward Island could not afford to pay a 25 per cent increase would not be a factor that an arbitrator could take into consideration. Now they must because it is on the list. In other words, in your deliberations you must take the following into account.

There are criteria for the commissions in many provinces already. The Provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, Quebec and Prince Edward Island have them. The act of Prince Edward Island, for example, includes as criteria the need to provide fair and reasonable compensation to judges, the management board policy and other relevant considerations respecting judges' expenses, any changes in the cost of living, the need to attract excellent candidates, the prevailing economic conditions in the province and the overall state of the provincial economy, and the salaries and benefits paid to other provincial court judges in other Canadian jurisdictions. I do not see it here, but it says probably "and any other relevant criteria," but under the ejusdem generis rule you do not get too far away from that sort of stuff.

New Zealand's statute includes very interesting criteria. They are: the need to achieve and maintain fair relativity with the levels of remuneration received elsewhere; the need to be fair, both to the persons or group of persons whose remuneration is being determined, and to the taxpayer or ratepayer; and the need to recruit and maintain competent persons. Those are criteria which the commission must take into account.

Mr. Scott: I started this by sounding as if I do not agree with Senator Joyal on this. I am saying that those are as obvious as they can be. It is not as though they are very earth shattering. While you were speaking, I wrote: "What would the criteria be? What others are being paid, what is being paid elsewhere, what is the cost of living, what is needed to attract the right candidates, and what is the state of the economy."

Senator Bryden: Then put it in the statute.

Mr. Scott: I have no problem with that, but once you go beyond that the problems arise.

Senator Bryden: The commission is to be comprised of three people -- one nominated by the judiciary, one nominated by the Minister of Justice of Canada, and a third, who will be the chairman, agreed upon by the first two.

As Senator Lawson and I know, in the real world people sometimes cannot agree on who the third person will be. There is no provision in the bill for what happens in that circumstance.

I asked the minister what would happen in such a case and her response was that the first two people chosen would be fired and the process would start all over.

I presume that if one party -- presumably the government -- wanted to stonewall the process, it simply would not agree to the chair.

Mr. Scott: That is interesting because most arbitration statutes provide that in the event of a deadlock you apply to a judge -- which would be inappropriate in this case.

Senator Bryden: That is my next point. To break a deadlock you apply to a judge, and the judge would have some degree of interest in who is appointed as chair. That is odd.

Mr. Scott: It is odd. The minister may be right. The minister could tell the two persons who were appointed that if they cannot agree within 10 days, their appointment will be revoked and two will be found who can agree.

Senator Bryden: The minister does not have the power to do that under the statute. They would just have to come to some agreement.

If the judiciary continued to quash recommendations of the government to Parliament, or if they had the ability to quash or find ultra vires under the Constitutional a decision of Parliament, I assume that the status quo would remain in place until a change was finally effected through legislation. Therefore, it is not particularly in their interest to be totally unreasonable.

Senator Moore: They can still change the legislation.

Senator Bryden: That is right, but I am a little concerned in that this whole issue basically grew out of judicial disobedience in P.E.I., where the provincial court judges took the position that they could not handle these cases because they were biased.

They were biased because the person who paid them was either reducing their pay or was not prepared to increase it. Therefore, in any case where you had the Crown, Regina, against Joe Blow, the judge might very well be prejudiced against Regina and let the guy off. To my mind, that is judicial disobedience, like civil disobedience. Finally, it bubbled up and the issue arrived here.

We are back at the arena of Senator Lawson and myself: Who has the most power? Parliament has the ability to refuse to pass the legislation, and the judges have the ability to say that, if that is true, they will not hear any cases. Somehow we have to be sure to avoid those circumstances.

About the question of criteria, there are some criteria already established by the courts. One of them we have not discussed because it does not happen very often. To my knowledge, it has happened only in one case at the inferior level.

In the case of provincial judges, the Supreme Court declared a reduction of salaries as invalid, as ultra vires. It forced the government to reimburse the judges.

When we read the question of independence of judges, we must take into account the fact that, in that case, we were concerned with the real problem because there were some reductions of judges at the provincial level.

I do not know in which constitution this is found but I remember having read a constitution that makes it impossible to reduce the salary of a judge. It is unconstitutional right at the beginning. There is no such thing in our country, but I guess we may infer from that that if there is a reduction, that is at least strike two for the government because it seems, prima facie, to go against the principle of the independence of the judiciary. What do you think?

Mr. Scott: I have two points on that. It is interesting that, in the P.E.I. case, the court concluded that an across-the-board freeze is, theoretically, a reduction. Because the cost of living is increasing, it is a reduction.

In the Beauregard case, the argument was that, after the judge's appointment, a change in the law requiring contributory pensions was a reduction. Chief Justice Dickson concluded that it was a reduction but it was a legitimate reduction. That case came from the Quebec Court of Appeal. There had been a bill in the house and, literally weeks after the judge's appointment, the law was proclaimed to the effect that judges, who before had free pensions, now had to make contributions. He interpreted that, not surprisingly, as a form of reduction of his salary. He sued Her Majesty and it went through to the Federal Court. He was successful at every level until the Supreme Court divided and he lost.

The court concluded -- and this was really the beginning in Chief Justice Dickson's notion of across-the-board, even-handed treatment. The conclusion was that everybody contributes to his or her pension so why should not judges contribute to theirs? They found there was nothing unconstitutional.

The argument was a constitutional one -- that salaries must be fixed and provided and that it is inappropriate to reduce them. It was rejected. A reduction without more is not necessarily, in contemporary terms, evidence of anything.

Senator Beaudoin: There may be a case where it might be justified.

Mr. Scott: It might be justifiable. I think it is the juxtaposition. In an interesting example, a bill was discussed in Arizona where, on the one hand, there was a lot of talk about judges being out of control -- which is the way it develops -- while, coincidentally, over here, there was a discussion about the level of their income being too high. If these things are discussed at the same time, it gives you pause and it is troubling. That is the kind of thing where a reduction may be seen.

Senator Fraser: Almost identical to that, I have been sitting here brooding about how this would play out in practice. I am really troubled by the notion of giving a profession the right to, effectively, control its own pay when its salaries are paid out of public money.

Senator Lawson: That is what MPs do.

Senator Fraser: MPs must go back to the public, which is why they get in such a dither every time they have to think about a pay increase. Judges do not.

I was comforted by the observation of the chairman that, if we are talking about salary increases, when a judge says no to a bill, he does not get any increase at all. He is stuck with the status quo. However, when it comes to reduction, I seriously wonder because then, if a judge says no to the bill, he does not get a pay-cut. He gets to keep what he has.

I have enormous respect for judges but it seems to me that some of their wisdom -- and the pension case you cited is one example -- goes out the window when their own interests are at stake. There was a situation in Montreal a few years ago where judges were actually arguing that, in order to preserve their judicial independence, they had to continue to have indoor parking spots, free, near the elevator.

Mr. Scott: Surely there must be more to the argument than that.

Senator Fraser: No, they were busy persons and did not want to have to walk the length of the garage nor pay for the space.

You have outlined a couple of interesting elements that suggest that, ultimately, the judiciary has come a long way, such as Justice Lamer's reference to an across-the-board freeze being fair, in particular.

I am trying to find out whether, in our present state, we could reasonably assume that, faced with cuts across the board, affecting everybody, in the situation of deflation or of dire budgetary stringency where government needs to reduce pay for everyone, the courts would sit still for that or stonewall.

Mr. Scott: I am confident that they would sit still now. I do not know that they would have done so 10 years ago.

Senator Fraser: You think we have come that far?

Mr. Scott: Yes, I do.

Senator Fraser: You think we can read that into Justice Lamer's comments?

Mr. Scott: Yes. I do not have the language at hand, but he virtually says that. If you have an across-the-board treatment that affects everyone based on economic conditions, of course the judges would be required to accept it. It seems self-evident.

Senator Fraser: Of course, but parking spots near the elevator also seems self-evident to me.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Scott, for your help. You have kept the ball in our court.

Our next witness, Madame Lucie Laliberté, is a lawyer who has been doing research on women and pensions over the past 13 years. Her practice is focussed on family law. She is also the president of the Organization of Spouses of Military Members and has presented briefs on their behalf to the Government of the Province of Ontario, the House of Commons and the Senate Finance Committee. Ms Laliberté asked to appear before this committee because many of the proposed amendments in Bill C-37 are similar to those that she did research on for Bill C-35 and she thought that her experience would be of value to the committee, and the steering committee agreed.

Madame Laliberté, the floor is yours.

Ms Lucie Laliberté, Lawyer, Gahrns & Laliberté: I should like to raise one preliminary matter that arose from my discussions with the clerk before being allowed to appear here. I raised the issue that there is litigation on this matter before the courts at this time, and the clerk of the committee expressed some concern about that. For that reason I would like some direction.

I propose not to deal with the substance or the merits of the case, but it does relate specifically to the definition of "survivor benefit." I will keep my remarks limited to those issues that are raised in the case and also relate them to the issues that I found under Bill C-57.

Senator Beaudoin: Legally speaking, I do not see a big problem with this, if you are simply giving us the information you have in mind. As a committee of the Senate we have the right to hear witnesses. I understand your concern, but if you are prudent in your presentation, I do not see any problem.

Ms Laliberté: My concern was with the fact that the way it was presented to me, I might have declined to appear or I might have limited my presentation. I am a lawyer, so I worked my way around that. I appreciate your comments.

I will be speaking only to the issues relating to pension division and death benefits, including the survivor benefits in Bill C-57. I propose to start with a brief general comparison of the main provisions of the public service plans. The ones I am most familiar with are the CFSA, the RCMPSA and the PSSA, as opposed to some of the others that are covered there. I will then make a comparison with the Judges Act to show that the difference between the legislation is so significant that it cannot be said that what is happening is simply a harmonizing of those pieces of legislation.

The main point that I will be discussing is the fact that judges' pensions cannot be divided at source. No credit splitting is allowed, as is the case in all of the other pieces of legislation, including the Canada Pension Plan, and that significantly affects the impact on the survivor benefits part.

Before I deal with the actual problems, I should like to provide a different conceptual view of pensions as property and a contributory view of pensions as opposed to a dependency view of pensions.

I should like to start with the structure of the public service plans, specifically the three that I mentioned, first as they relate to marriage breakdown.

A credit splitting provision is allowed in all of those pensions. That is done pursuant to the Pension Benefits Division Act, which allows for an actuarial valuation of the pension plan and a lump sum transfer out of the plan into a locked-in RRSP for the spouse on marriage breakdown when it is done pursuant to a court order or to an agreement between the parties. As far as I can see, there is no such provision in the Judges Act.

There is also a provision in those pieces of legislation on marriage breakdown to allow for garnishment of salaries, as well as diversion of pension for support for children and spouses. The only thing I see in the Judges Act is that pension can be diverted; there is not a garnishment of salary for the purposes of support.

The next provision concerns what happens on death. In the public service plans there is what is called a supplementary death benefit pursuant to section 2 of the act. That is a declining term group life insurance benefit that is usually, with some exceptions, equivalent to two years' pay, paid out in a lump sum on the death of the member. That plan is contributory and the designation of the beneficiary is at the member's pleasure. It must be made, however, on a proper form. Situations have arisen where someone has designated a beneficiary in either a will or a separation agreement and it has not been upheld by the administrators of the plan.

It was originally designed to help defray the cost of funeral and other expenses when a person died. It has now been expanded to be much more than that. I relate this to section 46(1) of the Judges Act, but in the Judges Act it is only one-sixth of the pay, and that is to go to a surviving spouse on death. Under this amendment, there would not be a designation allowed. The beneficiary would be stipulated by the act.

There is also a provision for an annual allowance or a survivor benefit, which is generally 50 per cent of the pension benefit that is being paid or will be paid. That is to go to a surviving spouse, which does include a common-law spouse. However, the determination of who the surviving spouse is for the annual allowance, the monthly benefit, is also made by the administrator and not by the contributor. Contributors cannot designate who will receive the annual allowance or the survivor benefit. That is done totally at the discretion of Treasury Board, and we have been told that those decisions and the criteria that are used are governed by cabinet secrecy because, in essence, the legislation gives that power to the minister. We have had some difficulty trying to find out what the criteria are.

I will say, though, that everything is defined by marital status on the death of the contributor and there is actually a clause to prevent there being two spouses. The first spouse can actually be deemed to be dead, to have predeceased the contributor, in order to give the survivor benefit to the common-law or second spouse.

We have been told by Treasury Board that they do not apply that any more, but it used to be applied when the first spouse was separated and cohabiting with someone else herself. They would then give the whole benefit to the person who was cohabiting with the contributor. The law is still on the books. It is the subject of a challenge right now but it is still in the discretion of Treasury Board to do that.

Having said that, when deciding who the survivor is, they closely scrutinize who is living with whom and what the marital status is of the parties. Therefore, if a person is divorced, that person can never get the survivor benefit. If there is a separation, one of the criteria is the length of time the parties have been separated. If they have been separated for 10 years, no matter who was there during the contribution period they would decide in favour the common-law spouse.

There is also a definition of "surviving spouse" that is similar to the proposed new definition. There is no definition of "spouse" in the Judges Act and there is no definition of "surviving spouse." Under the amendment, the definition of "surviving spouse" includes "common-law spouse," but it really does not exclude "divorced spouse." There has been testimony before you that it has been interpreted that way and that divorced spouses can never receive the survivor benefit. That is the subject of an ongoing challenge. I will discuss the reasons for that once I have gone through the basic structure of the act.

There is also a minimum benefit to be paid out under all of these plans. That minimum guarantees that five years of contributions will be paid to the contributor. By that I mean that if a person dies after contributing to the plan for 20 years, but not yet having started to collect a pension, the estate can receive up to five years' worth of the benefit. If they were retired for two years, for example, their estate is still entitled to three years' worth of contribution, and that is integrated with any survivor benefits.

For example, if a spouse received a survivor benefit, or the children received a survivor benefit, that is deducted from the five-year minimum before the payout is actually given to the estate. As a further example, to clarify that, if there is no survivor, there are no children, and the person dies one day after retirement, the estate would get five years' worth of contributions.

This appears to be similar to section 51 of the Judges Act, but the judges receive only a return of their contributions into the plan, if that happens.

The Canada Pension Plan also allows for credit splitting. There is a distinction made in all of these plans between the pension benefit itself, which is deemed to die with the contributor, and the survivor benefit, which is seen to be an add-on, something extra that is different from the pension benefit itself. That is very important because it causes problems later on when spouses separate or divorce.

It is also a significant difference with the Judges Act, because when credit splitting is not allowed it makes a real difference in determining the fairness of who gets the survivor benefit.

Senator Moore: What do you mean by credit splitting?

Ms Laliberté: By that I mean that there is a lump sum paid directly out of the plan. In the case of CPP, there is a lump sum value placed on the benefit and it is prorated. That is put into an account for the non-member spouse on marriage breakdown once there is an agreement or order of the court on that marriage breakdown.

By credit splitting under the public service plan I mean that under the Family Law Act the value of the pension is an asset to be divided between the parties. In terms of a credit split, the Pension Benefits Division Act says that once the Family Law Act has been applied and there is an agreement or an order in place, then there is a enforcement mechanism.

Senator Moore: Which establishes the value of the asset to be distributed between the two individuals, the former spouse and the current spouse.

Ms Laliberté: That is right, and that includes the division of all of their property; the value of the pension, the value of severance pay, the value of houses, cars and RRSPs -- whatever they have. You come up with a number at the end. Then you can go to the pension plan itself and tell them to put a certain lump sum amount into a locked-in RRSP for the other spouse. That is what I mean by credit splitting.

The plan determines what the value of the plan is and, in order to maintain the viability of the plan, they say that there is a maximum amount allowed to be transferred out of it. If there is a shortfall, the spouses have to determine how that shortfall will be met if they reach the maximum allowed under the act.

That is what I mean by credit splitting. There is also another way of doing that, for which we argued previously but which was not done, and that is to impose a trust on the plan, separate out the spouse's portion and give it to her on a monthly basis when the pension comes into receipt. That has been systematically rejected, but it would still seem to be a viable option and not difficult administratively, because it is already done for purposes of support.

I should like to look quickly at the Family Law Act as well before I make the links with this legislation. There has been some talk in previous testimony that the common-law definition of "spouse" in the Family Law Act applies to property divisions. It does not. It only applies to support.

It is not just a definition of three years. It can be less than three years if there are children of the relationship and it is a relationship of some permanence. It can be less than three years in the Family Law Act.

This also happens in a number of pieces of legislation where you can have two different definitions. It happens in the Succession Law Reform Act as well, where there is an extended definition of spouse there, under the dependency provision that actually includes former spouse, as well as common-law spouse and legal spouse.

I believe I have defined how the property division occurs already due to that first question. I will move on to a concept of looking at pensions that is different from what I have also heard in previous testimony, and that is not looking at it as a dependency or as stereotypically something that is given as a gift to someone.

The family law legislation regarding property and pensions in Ontario was changed in 1986 to reflect the fact that marriage is a partnership and that a pension is something that is earned by both parties. It is a deferred savings plan that is earned by both of the parties throughout the contribution period. That view of it was also supported in a Supreme Court of Canada decision called Clark v. Clark, which said that Mr. Clark's pension was security for their retirement. The wife's contribution to the marriage partnership enabled Mr. Clark to maintain his employment and accumulate the pension benefits.

We are trying to have a shift in thinking. Pensions are earned over a long period of time and all the legislation only looks at a specific point in time, which is the contributor's time of death. In our view, that is where the unfairness comes in, because if we start looking at it as something that the spouse has earned throughout the partnership, then the way we view survivor benefits as well will be very different.

Those are also some of the arguments that we have for a Charter argument under section 15(6) discrimination because, in virtually all cases, it is the woman who is the non-contributing spouse, particularly in the Canadian Forces. In this, I am assuming with the judges, given the make-up of the courts right now.

If we are looking at it not as a dependency or as a gift but something that is earned, then it will help when I define some of the unfairness and inequities that still exist in the previous legislation that has been changed and that may be implemented again under Bill C-57.

I also submit that having that view removes any moral dilemma, if you will, as between common-law spouses and married spouses. If we look at it as something earned during the contribution period, then it may be fair to divide credits if a common-law spouse was there through the contribution period because she was contributing to the earnings and it was that particular group whose income was generating the pension ultimately.

I see problems in Bill C-57 in what is left out of it, as well as what is in it. The very first problem is that there is no method of credit splitting and, if there are no other assets on marriage breakdown, a divorcing spouse must take the pension on what we call an if-and-when basis. That becomes very hazardous to a divorced spouse. Previous witnesses have said that if spouses are divorced, the wife can never get the survivor benefit. Since the pension itself dies when the member dies, she loses her pension entitlements. If she does not have proper insurance in place to protect her, she has lost all of those benefits.

As an example, if you are looking at a high-ranking military officer, the value of the pensions I have seen can be as high as $800,000. You could be talking about $400,000 that should go to the ex-wife, and if he were to die the next day she has no way of enforcing her entitlements.

The other problem with that is when the spouses are divorcing, if there is no other way of enforcing that entitlement as between the two spouses, it causes a dilemma for them upon divorce. With a judge's pension you are probably looking at values of over $1 million if you have a long-term pension. If he cannot come up with $500,000 to give her and there are no other assets, or the assets only cover $250,000 of it, for example, in a matrimonial home, if he dies and she cannot get the survival benefit, she has lost $250,000. That severely affects her long-term viability financially, and it also shows why it would be unfair then to split the survivor benefits in the way that this bill is suggesting.

Prior to 1986, when there was no credit splitting, or early on into the legislation, sometimes the spouses were given the property entitlement as support. Today we have credit splitting and it is now the subject of litigation. Women either do not have the money to change their agreements to make it property so that they can now do the credit splitting, or they expect that they will be able to get the survivor benefit and they, sadly, find out when the contributor dies that they have lost their support entitlements.

We also have members who divorced, for example, in 1978. Their support is still intact but they were never given a share of the pension, though they were there through the contribution period. That is why I am saying it is important to look at it as something that was earned. In that case, you could look at it as what we call a constructive trust. There is an unjust enrichment that goes on. If she was there through the contribution period, she earned those pension entitlements, on our argument. Now, when he dies, she does not get the survivor benefits. That is an ongoing problem. There are fewer and fewer of those women, but it is still happening.

We also have a situation where we have a divorced spouse suing a second spouse -- right now there are several of them -- to get those survivor benefits. That is ongoing. In our view, it is really unfair. She may already be destitute; she has lost her support; she did not get the pension; she is often on social assistance at this point, and she must litigate to get the survivor benefit.

In this particular situation, the second spouse has already separated and she has her own pension as well, so she is getting the survivor benefit and her own pension. The first spouse of 30 years is getting nothing and living off the largess of her family actually, her children, at this point in time. That is in spite of the fact that we have credit-splitting legislation right now.

The reverse of that is if there is a split of credits, or if the parties have a way of splitting the pension between them. If that clean break has been made and all those assets could buy out that share of the pension, then I would say that the witnesses before you are correct. The apportionment through the contribution period between a common-law spouse and a separated spouse may be right, except that there is a problem in that there is a distinction. You can get divorced after living separate and apart for one year, but you can sever all the property and support issues. A divorced spouse who does not have her pension entitlements cannot get the survivor benefits when the contributing spouse dies.

However, if the parties are just separated and already have an agreement or a court order in place, the separated spouse can get an apportionment of survivor benefits. That is a serious inequity, which already exists in the previous legislation and will be put into this legislation as well, if it goes through the way it is now designed.

I want to make one other point in terms of the differences, and I am not absolutely positive on this particular point. I only found out that I was appearing yesterday and I did not really know that this was happening on survivor benefits until Friday. In terms of the interest rate for return of contributions for judges, I am reading that as 4 per cent compounded yearly. My understanding is that, in all the other plans, it is only 4 per cent simple interest. That may have changed since our previous presentation, but that is also a significant difference between the two plans. It does not directly have an impact here, but it could in terms of valuing pensions for the purposes of marriage breakdown.

The Chairman: We believe that has been aligned to changes in the public service, but that is a question we may have to ask.

Ms Laliberté: It should be checked.

Senator Murray: Ms Laliberté, have you turned your mind to the amendments that would be needed to correct the deficiencies which you have outlined in this bill? I do not mean a legal draft, but have you eyeballed the bill?

Ms Laliberté: First, we are trying to get a definition of "surviving spouse" for the other pieces of legislation.

We do not want to go with an interpretation by the administrators of the plan because, as I said, we do not have one. We have an extended definition of surviving spouse that included "former spouse," the way we have in the Ontario act regarding succession law reform.

It would be a start. You would still have a problem because you would have to link that to whether there had previously been a division of the pension credits.

There is something that I left out and it may be pertinent here. When a spouse gets a lump sum transfer out of the Pension Benefits Division Act, the act stipulates that she cannot get a survivor benefit. I would submit that is fair because she has already got a split of the pension credit. You would have to allow for that if you extended the definition of former spouse. It would have to exclude a spouse if all the splits had been done fairly and there had been a clean break between the spouses.

Senator Murray: As a layman, I have some difficulty with some of these terms. What is a "former spouse"? A spouse from whom one is divorced?

Ms Laliberté: Yes. Also, if we are looking at this as earned benefits between two people, which are shared on marriage breakdown, that could be a common-law spouse. The Pension Benefits Division Act itself allows for a credit split for common-law spouses and a period of cohabitation.

Senator Murray: Forgive me, but can you offer a definition of common-law spouse or common-law union?

Ms Laliberté: No. That is because it depends on which statute you are examining, if you want a statutory definition. If we are looking at "common-law," it is determined in each individual case. In determining who is a common-law spouse and who is the spouse who will get the survivor benefit, they will look at the bank accounts and whether they are shared. They ask if they take vacations together. Are they sleeping together? Do they have children together?

Generally, if the courts are making that determination, they are looking at the mode of living of the parties and how closely they fit a traditional definition of legal spouse. They look at all of those things.

Senator Murray: It does not matter whether the parties to the common-law union are both legally free to marry?

Ms Laliberté: No.

Senator Murray: That is not taken into account at all?

Ms Laliberté: No, it is not taken into account. That leads to all of the newspaper articles about harems and that sort of thing. I think we can bypass that by looking at the contribution period: Who was there through the contribution period? Where it is fair, one can look at the work that was done, the family funds that were used or of which the family was deprived.

If you always go back to that point and look at it as an earned benefit of both spouses, not just the contributing spouse, you can bypass some of that. However, you still must come up with definitions.

Senator Murray: It is not fair to ask you for free legal advice, but you have come here and possibly you would provide to the chairman or to the clerk a brief outline, without necessarily doing the drafting, of the changes that you think would be necessary in this bill?

Ms Laliberté: I practise family law and I do not do much legislative drafting. I draft agreements and that sort of thing. I believe Treasury Board has already grappled with this issue and either did not want to, or could not come up with, some definitions.

We are looking back historically over years, particularly with the Canadian Forces, because they have had pension plans for the longest period as they tried to recruit and retain personnel for brief periods of time. They would disenfranchise a spouse if she was independently wealthy, way back. We need to free ourselves from the old history on this, bring ourselves up-to-date in concept.

I am prepared to do some of that but it is really difficult when you are dealing with such an old concept, which still looks at who the spouses are and their marital status on the day the judge dies. We are really still looking at stereotypes. You are saying that the person he is with right now is the person who should get all the benefits. Why is that?

We are focusing on "him" and it almost makes it look like there are two women fighting over this. The reality is that we focus on the contributor. It is the judge's benefit and the judge should get to decide who will receive it.

We are trying to shift away from that. Those are basically section 15 arguments.

Senator Murray: Have you looked at this bill in this context?

Ms Laliberté: Yes, I believe there are some section 15 Charter challenges in Bill C-37 related to the survivor benefits. There is already one in process based on the other legislation. What you are doing here, especially as it relates to the definition of "surviving spouse," is entrenching that. Everyone has been focusing on "common-law spouse," but I say this relates to former spouses and the depriving of benefits from spouses who were there for the whole contribution period.

Senator Joyal: I cannot resist the temptation to propose to you a specific case and then to try to pin down the principles at stake. Examples are always easier to understand.

Let us make the following case. A judge has a common-law spouse for, say, ten years. He has children with the person and then they break up. He lives with a person for one year, in a common-law situation. Who gets the money?

Ms Laliberté: Who gets the survivor benefit? I always want to be very clear. We are not looking at the pension benefit. We are looking at the survivor benefit. Under this legislation, in my view, the person who was there for one year receives the survivor benefit.

Senator Joyal: The bill does not recognize the common-law situation while in fact the judge may have had a "family" with the first person for 10 or 15 years. Of course, they are not legally bound in the ordinary concept of marriage, even though they may have some financial responsibility to one another for the child. For instance, that person would be totally deprived of the benefit of the surviving spouse within the framework of this bill.

Ms Laliberté: Under family law legislation, she would not get a share of the pension either, unless she could make a constructive trust argument of her own that he would be unjustly enriched. That first person of 10 years could be deprived of the pension benefit under family law and also deprived of the survivor benefit under this bill, if it becomes law.

Senator Joyal: My point is well made. The principle now at stake is the one that you stated in your opening remarks, namely, the test of dependency versus the test of partnership.

This rang a bell in our ears because we heard from the minister last week. She said that the department is reviewing the concept of "spouse" in the family unit on the basis of dependency.

I am puzzled by that. I wonder if we are going backwards by returning to the principle of dependency and not partnership, the way you have outlined it to us. Could you expand on that so that we can profit from your experience in your practice of law in that regard?

Ms Laliberté: I believe that it is a step backwards to have an overview of the whole legislation based on dependency. Although you find that there is a financial dependency, that is built up on the fact that you do not recognize all the unpaid work that these spouses are doing throughout the contribution period. That is where we moved ahead with family law legislation across all the provinces to make that distinction. Although there was a financial dependency, you did not want the person who was being paid for their labour getting all the financial benefits of the marriage partnership when the marriage broke down. The Supreme Court of Canada has spoken clearly on that in relation to support. That is why the family law legislation was changed in the mid-1980s to divide the value of the pensions assets.

Part of the problem is that survivor benefits have not been determined to be an asset. There is one case where the judge declined to put a value on the survivor benefit. To a certain extent, I see the reasoning in that decision because the judge, in this case, will never see that benefit. They thought they could not make that a benefit for the judge. It is possible that they could make the argument that the survivor benefit is actually the property of the spouse who is there throughout the contribution period. That has not been done yet. It may not be something that will happen in the other pieces of legislation because we have credit splitting. But, with the judges, you might find women litigating that aspect of it in order to get the survivor benefit, particularly if they have been deprived of the actual pension benefits themselves.

Senator Joyal: For me, the question of dependency does not put the two persons on an equal footing. There is always someone who waits for someone else to do something. This is contrary to equality on the spousal relationship. A spousal relationship -- be it a same-sex relationship or a heterosexual relationship -- whether or not they have children or both of them are billionaires, is an equal kind of relationship. Anything that accrues to one partner should benefit the other in the context of pension, even if they do not need the pension, because the spouse might be richer than the person who has contributed to the pension.

The question of dependency touches upon something that I have a reluctance to envisage in the principles that I think are right. I might be wrong, but that is how I see the situation.

Ms Laliberté: It is only support that is based on need and the ability to pay. Assets are determined and equalized between the parties in family law. It used to be that pensions and survivor benefits were based on need, but that is not, and should not, be the case any more. That is what I see the minister saying. I briefly read her comments and I feel that same apprehension. That is a step in the wrong direction. We should be looking at an equal partnership and then looking at the survivor benefits after that.

Senator Joyal: Should we be looking at them as assets?

Ms Laliberté: That is right.

Senator Joyal: That is an important concept at stake in defining the surviving spouse. As you said, there is no definition of "surviving spouse" contained in the other legislation that you studied.

Ms Laliberté: There is no definition of "surviving spouse" in the Judges Act and they are adding something that already has no definition. That is problematic. There is no definition of "spouse" there, either.

When you leave the interpretation to Treasury Board or to the administrators, they have determined that the former spouse cannot be a surviving spouse. When you do not have the definition, it works both ways. Sometimes it is good, but in that case I think it is bad.

Senator Joyal: Do you think that the concept of assets underlined the principles of what you think a pension is?

Ms Laliberté: Yes, and it also leaves too much discretion to the administrators of the plan to decide who gets the benefits. That is what happens if you do not have a definition. The administrators of the plan will then decide who the surviving spouse is or what the rationale is behind it.

I did not say a lot about that lump sum benefit, but the judge has no right to designate that. If there is no method of credit splitting, the spouse is only protected, if he dies, through insurance and lump sum benefits. You then preclude the parties from making an agreement between themselves that would allow the wife to receive that benefit to protect her own pension interests. It certainly is much more than what is needed for funeral expenses. That adds to that.

Senator Lawson: It is obviously a complex question -- both the issue of benefits and survivor benefits. We must proceed quite carefully concerning how we deal with it.

Recently, I received a letter from the U.S. government that said, "You may be entitled to social security benefits. Please report to the office." So I did. I had lived partially in the U.S., so I was entitled to benefits under social security. They said that they had to ask me a number of questions. I said, "All right." They said, "Do you have any ex-wives?" I said, "Is there a minimum number that you need to qualify for benefits?"

I phrased that rather badly, but our rules provide that if you have any ex-wives who lived with you in marriage for more than 10 years, each one is entitled to 50 per cent of the benefit you are receiving. Assuming your benefit is $1,000 a month and you have four ex-wives, over a 40-year period each one of them would receive $500 a month.

Ms Laliberté: You could quickly bankrupt the plan.

Senator Lawson: That is what I am saying. We are engaging in a dangerous area here. We must examine it carefully. The issue of fairness that you raise is very important. This may be a broader question that involves more than the Judges Act.

You mentioned the Canada Pension Plan, which is similar to social security. I do not know if any of those rules apply. It is absent from any of the provisions dealing with fairness, division, assets and beneficiaries. It seems like a very complex question.

Ms Laliberté: This is a very complex question. Although the CPP is being lumped in by the minister, it is very different again, in that there is credit-splitting. Therefore, the first spouse can have her credit put into her own account. Then it does not seem so bad if the common-law spouse of one year receives the survivor benefit. However, it could be. I do not want to say whether it is or is not, however, there are challenges to the survivor benefits under the CPP going on right now as well.

Senator Lawson: Canada Pension limit the number of ex-wives that you can have? Should there be a limit?

Ms Laliberté: For credit-splitting they prorate it.

Senator Moore: When you were speaking with respect to apportioning the annuity, proposed section 44.1 (1) states that "... if there are two surviving spouses ... each surviving spouse shall receive a share of the annuity prorated in accordance with subsection (2) for his or her life."

Ms Laliberté: That is an addition, right. I would like to clarify that this proposed section refers to marriage after the contribution period.

The Chairman: I do not believe so.

Ms Laliberté: That is right, it is not.

Senator Moore: In your remarks, you said that this bill is written such that there is no apportionment for the first spouse.

Ms Laliberté: If they are divorced, the divorced spouse is out.

Senator Cools: Is excluded from this.

Ms Laliberté: That is what I meant. If they are just separated, there is an apportionment. If they are divorced, there is not.

Senator Moore: That presumes that there is no separation agreement. It also presumes that the court order dealing with the divorce action did not stipulate apportionment.

Ms Laliberté: I do not think that is the case. That is the case for a separated spouse.

If the parties are divorced, even if there is no agreement or order in place regarding the pension, that spouse cannot get the survivor benefit, whether or not they have an agreement in place. A spouse who is separated, however, whether or not they have an agreement in place, can get that apportionment of the survivor benefit.

Senator Moore: Why is that? I am confused.

Ms Laliberté: There is no definition of surviving spouse, and the administrators have determined that a divorced spouse cannot be a surviving spouse, which is the subject of ongoing litigation with the other legislation as well.

I am submitting that that could easily lead to a significant amount of litigation here or inequities if the spouse cannot pursue the litigation.

Senator Moore: If the definition of surviving spouse included a former spouse who has not received an apportionment under any other statute or a separation agreement or a court order and divorce action, that would help you.

Ms Laliberté: It would help, but there is still a problem if there is no credit-splitting and she is getting her share of the pension on a monthly basis. If the spouse is divorced, she will lose her entitlement as soon as the judge dies, and if she is divorced she cannot receive the survivor benefit. Therefore, it helps but it does not go far enough.

Senator Moore: You said in your closing remarks that with respect to the lump sum benefit the judge has no right to designate the beneficiary. Did you mean he should not have the right?

Ms Laliberté: I am saying he should have the right.

Senator Moore: If he does not have the right, why?

Ms Laliberté: Under this amendment he would. He may now, however, I can come back and clarify some points. On my reading of the amendment, the statute says that it will go to the common-law spouse of one year.

The previous legislation did not designate who it was; it just said "surviving spouse." I do not know if it was the judge who would designate it or if it was the administrator of the plan under the Judges Act. I know that under the Canadian Forces legislation, for example, it is up to the member to designate who receives the lump sum benefit but not the survivor benefit.

I know it gets confusing. The member designates not the monthly benefit but the lump sum life insurance one-time payment. That allows the parties, when they are negotiating their separation agreement, to protect a spouse vis-à-vis pension entitlements and support entitlements in the event of the death of the other spouse.

Senator Moore: Turning to page 6, clause 9, a surviving spouse is not entitled to receive an annuity under this section if the surviving spouse has waived his or her entitlement to the annuity under a separation agreement entered into in accordance with applicable provincial law.

Should we be adding there "or in accordance with a court order or a divorce action between the parties"? I do not see any references here to divorce orders in divorce actions. We see mention of separation agreements.

Ms Laliberté: If you refer to separation agreements, normally you also include court orders.

I have another problem with that. Generally, that is not a provision of orders, you do not even look at the survivor benefit. My experience has been that administrators of the Public Service plan do not give effect to agreements between parties, court orders or wills when people are dealing with their survivor benefits.

Therefore, I had some concerns when I read this clause that the administrators may have to, now that it has been included; however, it is not something that is generally looked at when parties are separating and drafting agreements. I am not sure where it comes from, but I would say that if you were doing it by agreement, you should include court orders, because the two go hand in hand.

Senator Moore: At the top of page 8, clause 11, which deals with one-sixth lump sum, you are calling this the survivor benefit, right?

Ms Laliberté: No, this is a lump sum benefit.

Senator Moore: I am getting confused with the pension benefit and survivor benefit.

Ms Laliberté: It is confusing. This one is a lump sum payment separate from the survivor benefit.

It says, "...if a judge dies while holding office." I do not know what happens if the judge is not holding office. There is a different death benefit in the Judges Act, which is not referred to here. This looks like a benefit of a lump sum if the judge dies while in office, and that is the one that is designated in the statute to go to a surviving spouse.

Senator Moore: Would it be helpful if that proposed section included a phrase whereby each surviving spouse would receive a share of that lump sum in a prorated manner similar to what is in section 44?

Ms Laliberté: I suggest that that would be better than what is here, but the wording of this should be changed to allow the judge to designate who would get that lump-sum benefit in order to allow for what I spoke of earlier, which is protection for reasons other than just funeral expenses.

Senator Sparrow: They should be allowed to designate an individual or his estate?

Ms Laliberté: Yes, and they could do that by contract. It would be left to the judge and the spouses to determine who that would be on a breakdown. That would allow them to order their agreements on marriage breakdown as well as to protect the person who needed the protection or who was entitled to the protection.

Senator Lawson: We receive a statement every year that talks about the death benefit and asks who the designee is. I do not know why it would be different here.

Ms Laliberté: On the survivors' death benefit, although you can designate, you can only designate it on the specific form. Treasury Board has overridden giving the supplementary death benefit to someone who has been designated in a will or in a separation agreement. I would think that you would want to avoid that.

Senator Cools: I was very impressed by this witness's testimony. I wish to thank her. Apparently she has been working on this subject matter in respect of wives of people in the military. I thought that on such short notice she put together a remarkable presentation.

The Chairman: You have certainly demonstrated your intimate knowledge of your field. I thank you for coming and sharing it with us. As a consequence, I believe we will have many more questions to consider.

Ms Laliberté: Thank you for inviting me.

The committee adjourned.

EVIDENCE

OTTAWA, Thursday, October 22, 1998

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill C-37, to amend the Judges Act and to make consequential amendments to other Acts, met this day at 11:05 a.m. to give consideration to the bill.

Senator Lorna Milne (Chairman) in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: This meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is now in session. We will proceed to clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-37, to amend the Judges Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

Senator Moore: Honourable senators, I move that the committee complete clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-37.

Senator Cools: Before we move to clause-by-clause consideration, I wish to raise a question of privilege.

Senator Grafstein: To be fair, Senator Cools did declare her intention in advance of the motion. I would hope that Senator Moore could withhold his motion so that Senator Cools has an opportunity to make her statement.

The Chairman: That is quite right.

Senator Cools, the floor is yours.

Senator Cools: Thank you for your consideration. In any event, it has always been my understanding that questions of privilege take precedence.

We had an interesting situation yesterday where, as a committee, we engaged in some unusual methodology. In hearing from Department of Justice officials, certain senators indicated their intention to bring forward motions. The content and intent of the motions were worthy. However, I questioned the procedural technique that was being used. I have never really encountered a situation where there is a public discussion between department officials and members about their intentions to bring certain motions.

I will agree with the motions when they are actually brought forth.

Yesterday, we had a discussion, without the motion, to discuss the subject matter being before us. Those questions were raised briefly and not as sufficiently as I would have liked because I did not want to resort to the technique of formally making a point of order or any more strenuous procedural technique. I thought the appeal to common sense and to our customs would have prevailed.

My concern about the techniques used yesterday has been heightened. Information has come into my possession that many of the interested judges — those who would be affected by these provisions — have known for quite some time that these clauses — what I have learned to call the "spousal clauses" — will be deleted.

TÉMOIGNAGES

OTTAWA, le jeudi 22 octobre 1998

Le comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, auquel a été renvoyé le projet de loi C-37, Loi modifiant la Loi sur les juges et d'autres lois en conséquence, se réunit aujourd'hui à 11 h 05 pour en étudier la teneur.

Le sénateur Lorna Milne (présidente) occupe le fauteuil.

[Traduction]

La présidente: Je déclare ouverte cette séance du comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles. Nous procéderons à l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-37, Loi modifiant la Loi sur les juges et d'autres lois en conséquence.

Le sénateur Moore: Honorables sénateurs, je propose que le comité procède à l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-37.

Le sénateur Cools: Avant de passer à l'étude article par article, j'aimerais soulever une question de privilège.

Le sénateur Grafstein: En toute justice, le sénateur Cools avait fait part de son intention avant le dépôt de la motion. J'espère que le sénateur Moore peut différer sa motion de manière à ce que le sénateur Cools puisse faire sa déclaration.

La présidente: C'est tout à fait juste.

Sénateur Cools, vous avez la parole.

Le sénateur Cools: Merci. De toute façon, j'ai toujours cru que les questions de privilège avaient préséance.

Il s'est passé quelque chose d'intéressant hier alors qu'à ce comité, nous avons fait quelque chose d'inhabituel. Lors de l'audition de hauts fonctionnaires du ministère de la Justice, certains sénateurs ont manifesté leur intention de déposer des motions dont le contenu et l'intention étaient louables. Cependant, je mets en doute la façon de procéder. Il ne m'est jamais vraiment arrivé d'assister à un débat public entre des hauts fonctionnaires du ministère et des membres d'un comité au sujet de leur intention de déposer certaines motions.

J'appuierai les motions lorsqu'elles seront bel et bien déposées.

Hier, nous avons parlé, sans la motion, de discuter du sujet du projet de loi qui nous a été confié. Ces questions ont été soulevées brièvement et pas autant que je l'aurais voulu parce que je ne n'ai pas voulu en venir à formuler officiellement une objection ou à recourir à une procédure beaucoup plus ardue. J'ai cru que l'appel à notre sens commun et à nos coutumes aurait prévalu.

Mon inquiétude au sujet des méthodes employées hier s'est accrue. Selon les renseignements dont je dispose, bon nombre des juges intéressés — ceux qui seraient visés par ces dispositions — savaient depuis un certain temps que ces articles — ce que j'appelle maintenant les «dispositions relatives au conjoint» — seront supprimées.

As far as I am concerned, when one has had a political victory, one never does complain. I am pleased that reason, common sense, and judiciousness have prevailed and that certain individuals have recognized that these clauses were indeed very questionable and suspicious, not to mention embarrassing, and that they were sadly in need of amendment. I am also pleased that, after several weeks of effort, the minister has finally conceded that something was very wrong and that she herself was prepared to accept changes, mainly the deletion of those clauses from Bill C-37.

However, having said that, I believe that some "impropriety", and perhaps that is not the appropriate word, but a less-than-parliamentary occurrence has taken place. That, I believe, should be brought to the attention of members of this committee. To me, it is most distressing and vexing that certain interested judges and other interested parties will have information about the deletion or amendment of these clauses far in advance of the members of the Senate themselves knowing, or far in advance of any formal, procedural, or parliamentary activity to implement those wishes.

As I said before, this is not the first time that I have worked on committees and encountered this situation. For example, last year before our committee reached its clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-41, certain persons at the Department of Justice, or whoever, had already put certain information into the public domain.

Let me be clear so no one would, for a moment, suggest that I am opposed to freedom of the press: I am a great believer in freedom of the press. My concern is that this information has been made available to interested judges and that there are currently separation agreements, and whatever other agreements being entered into, based on information which certain people have received. I find that very questionable.

It seems to me that, if we are doing proper and judicious work, which we have been doing, the formal process of Parliament should be allowed to function without the unnecessary, inconvenient or inappropriate release of information to interested individuals. This question is usually raised quite publicly when the Minister of Finance is preparing a budget.

I raise this as a question of privilege. I believe that there has been an impropriety, that there has been a breach, and that it is indeed unfortunate that information is out and available before senators have been informed, or before any senator has moved a motion in this committee to basically delete those clauses.

An additional consideration is that, frequently in committee and in the chamber, I raise the issue of constant, ongoing, persistent, and insistent contact between certain persons, whomever they may be, at the Department of Justice and certain judges of this land. I find it extremely disturbing and unhelpful that this information is in the hands of certain parties prior to it being in my hands.

To that extent, I consider this to be a very serious breach of my privileges here. As I said before, I support the minister's agreement to these amendments and I would have appreciated it À ce que je sache, quand quelqu'un remporte une victoire politique, il ne se plaint jamais. Je suis heureuse que la raison, le sens commun et la sagesse aient prévalu et que certaines personnes aient reconnu que ces dispositions étaient très discutables et très contestables, pour ne pas dire embarrassantes, et qu'elles avaient grandement besoin d'être modifiées. Je me réjouis aussi de voir que, après plusieurs semaines d'efforts, la ministre a finalement admis que quelque chose n'allait pas et qu'elle était prête à accepter des changements, plus particulièrement le retrait de ces articles du projet de loi C-37.

Cependant, cela dit, je crois qu'une «irrégularité», et ce n'est peut-être pas le mot qui convient, un événement moins que parlementaire s'est produit et devrait, selon moi, être signalé aux membres de ce comité. Quant à moi, je trouve très frustrant que certains juges et autres parties intéressées seront mis au courant du retrait de ces dispositions ou d'amendements qui pourraient y être apportés, et ce bien avant que le Sénat ou toute activité officielle, procédurale ou parlementaire s'en charge.

Comme je l'ai déjà dit, ce n'est pas la première fois qu'une telle situation se présente à un comité auquel je siège. Par exemple, l'année dernière, avant que notre comité entreprenne l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-41, certaines personnes du ministère de la Justice ou qui vous voulez avaient déjà divulgué certains renseignements.

Je veux bien me faire comprendre afin que personne ne laisse entendre le moindrement que je m'oppose à la liberté de presse en laquelle je crois fermement. Ce qui me laisse perplexe, c'est que cette information a été mise à la disposition des juges intéressés et qu'il y a à l'heure actuelle des ententes en matière de séparation et quelque autre entente conclue, qui sont basées sur l'information que certaines personnes ont obtenue. Je trouve cela très suspect.

Il me semble que, si nous accomplissons judicieusement notre travail, ce que nous avons fait, le processus parlementaire officiel ne devrait pas être entravé par la diffusion inutile, inopportune ou inappropriée d'information à des personnes intéressées. Cette question est habituellement soulevée assez publiquement lorsque le ministre des Finances prépare un budget.

Je soulève ce point en tant que question de privilège. Je crois qu'une irrégularité a été commise, qu'il y a eu un manquement et qu'il est en fait malheureux que de l'information soit diffusée avant que les sénateurs soient mis au courant ou avant qu'un sénateur propose une motion à ce comité portant pour ainsi dire retrait de ces dispositions.

En outre, il m'est arrivé fréquemment, en comité et à la Chambre, de soulever la question des contacts constants, permanents, persistants et insistants entre certaines personnes, peu importe de qui il peut s'agir, du ministère de la Justice et certains juges de ce pays. Je trouve tout à fait inquiétant et peu utile que cette information soit divulguée à certaines parties avant de m'être transmise.

Je considère qu'il s'agit d'une grave atteinte à mon privilège. Je le répète, je suis d'accord avec la ministre qui appuie ces amendements et j'aurais apprécié que les sénateurs aient l'honneur had senators had the honour and the privilege of hearing this first, before the information was released into certain secretive circles.

Other persons may wish to speak to this point of privilege.

The Chairman: Before I open up the floor to discussion, Senator Cools, I should point out that this committee does not have the power to rule on a matter of privilege. If the committee so wishes, it must be reported to the Senate for decision.

I should also point out to you that, historically, the manner of proceeding in this committee has been to allow all members of the committee to know what was coming down the pike.

I think Senator Beaudoin will bear me out on this. I know that a similar situation happened when he was chair of this committee and I was sitting in as a member. This has been the custom of this committee, and I think we should proceed on those same grounds.

Senator Cools: That is not my question. My question is not on what you did yesterday. I accepted what you did yesterday. The question of privilege, the breach that I perceive, is the fact that other persons in this land, namely certain judges, are in possession of what we were to do as senators prior to any senator making statements about this in this committee and prior to senators having an opportunity to move motions to that effect. That is my concern, and I think it would behoove this committee to try to discover who has been making this information available to the judges of this land.

I am pleased that there has been progress made regarding these clauses but, frankly, I think we should have a chance to vote on it, or at least let the system move ahead.

The Chairman: We are about to have a chance to vote on it.

Senator Joyal: Following the statement made by Senator Cools, and since yesterday I was the member of the committee who notified my colleagues of my intention to move some amendments, I would like to bring a point of clarification. I would like to make a formal statement that I never, directly or indirectly, consulted any member of the bench, at any level, to get their opinion or reaction on my intention to move forward with any amendments and I never asked anyone in my office to do so.

I would like that point to be very clear on the record. If Senator Cools' statements happen to be true, it is certainly not because I was in any way part of an initiative that would have made my intentions known by any judge in this land.

The Chairman: I would further add — if I may, Senator Cools — that I want it made absolutely clear that any amendments that may be proposed today are not being proposed by the Minister of Justice. They are the Liberal senators' amendments.

Senator Cools: I accept that and I approve. I would like to be clear here. It was never my intention to question Senator's integrity in any form or fashion. I have known him for a long time. He is a man of outstanding character.

et le privilège d'être mis au courant avant que l'information soit diffusée dans certains cercles secrets.

Quelqu'un d'autre a peut-être quelque chose à dire au sujet de cette question de privilège.

La présidente: Avant de céder la parole à d'autres sénateurs, sénatrice Cools, je dois vous dire que ce comité n'est pas autorisé à se prononcer sur des questions de privilège. S'il veut le faire, il doit faire rapport au Sénat afin qu'il prenne une décision.

Je dois aussi vous dire que ce comité a toujours eu comme principe de permettre à tous ses membres de savoir ce qui va se passer.

Je crois que le sénateur Beaudoin confirmera ce qui suit. Je sais qu'une situation similaire s'est présentée lorsqu'il présidait ce comité et que j'y siégeais comme membre. Telle a été la pratique à ce comité et je crois que nous devrions poursuivre dans la même veine.

Le sénateur Cools: Ce n'est pas ce qui me préoccupe. Je m'interroge au sujet de ce que nous avons fait hier. J'ai accepté ce que vous avez fait hier. La question de privilège, l'infraction que je perçois, a à voir avec le fait que d'autres personnes dans ce pays, à savoir certains juges, ont été mises au courant de ce que nous nous apprêtions à faire en tant que sénateurs avant qu'un sénateur fasse une déclaration à ce sujet à ce comité et avant que les sénateurs aient l'occasion de proposer des motions à cet effet. C'est à ce sujet que je m'interroge et je crois qu'il incombe à ce comité d'essayer de déterminer qui a diffusé cette information aux juges de ce pays.

Je suis heureuse que des progrès aient été faits en ce qui concerne ces articles mais, en toute franchise, je crois que nous devrions avoir la chance de voter sur la question ou du moins de laisser le système suivre son cours.

La présidente: Nous sommes sur le point de voter sur ces motions.

Le sénateur Joyal: Pour faire suite à la déclaration du sénateur Cools et comme c'est moi qui ai informé hier mes collègues de mon intention de présenter certains amendements, j'aimerais éclaircir un point. J'aimerais dire officiellement que je n'ai jamais, directement ou indirectement, consulté un juge de quelque niveau que ce soit pour savoir ce qu'il pensait de mon intention de proposer des amendements. Je n'ai jamais non plus demandé à personne de mon bureau de le faire.

J'aimerais que ma déclaration soit consignée au compte rendu. Si les déclarations du sénateur Cools devaient s'avérer juste, ce n'est assurément pas parce que j'ai participé de quelque manière à une initiative qui aurait permis de révéler mes intentions à un juge de ce pays.

La présidente: J'ajouterais — si vous le permettez, sénateur — que je tiens à ce qu'il soit absolument clair qu'aucun des amendements qui seront proposés aujourd'hui n'émane du ministre de la Justice. Ils sont présentés par les sénateurs libéraux.

Le sénateur Cools: Je l'accepte et j'approuve. J'aimerais me faire bien comprendre. Mon intention n'a jamais été de remettre en question l'intégrité du sénateur d'aucune façon que ce soit. Je le connais depuis longtemps. C'est un homme remarquable.

The information that I was referring to is obviously being exchanged between certain individuals at the Department of Justice and other persons across this land. I do not believe that members of this committee divulged the information. Let me be clear, so that no one thinks I was questioning that point.

Madam Chair, you have said that you cannot rule on a question of privilege. I know the rules concerning this well. However, this committee can resolve to take some action to investigate the matter in order to discover how this sort of information has been received by certain people. Perhaps the minister could come here to explain or perhaps we could recall the departmental officials to explain. I believe there is something here that commands attention.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Cools. However, for this committee to proceed in such a manner, we would need an order to do so from the Senate.

Senator Cools: In that case, since I cannot move a motion on this committee to that effect, I would urge the chairman or a member of this committee to put forward a motion asking the Senate to study the matter.

Senator Grafstein: Since I am a voting member of the committee, perhaps I could suggest to Senator Cools that a question of privilege, first and foremost, must arise and be stated at the first possible moment. In other words, if somebody's privileges are impinged, the rules state that the senator whose privileges one believes are impinged or interfered with must raise the issue. I assume that is why Senator Cools has raised it here.

Having said that, since Senator Cools believes that this is a matter of her privileges being encroached upon — and, ultimately, it might affect others — the appropriate way to deal with this matter that she is contesting is for the committee to take note of it. I assume we have already done so because it is noted on the record. If the senator wishes to pursue it, she should do so before the full chamber at the appropriate time, which would be today. I have not looked at the questions myself, but I am always sensitive to the privileges of senators. I assume that is the appropriate practice, but I look to Senator Beaudoin and others who may be more familiar with the rules. I am having difficulty with Senator Cools' position that a privilege has been breached because she is a non-voting member of the committee. I am not sure how the privilege is breached. Unless I am told otherwise, I conclude that this is a matter for the full chamber.

I would ask Senator Beaudoin for his comments and then we can move on.

Senator Beaudoin: If a person wishes to raise a point of privilege, then he or she must be a member of the committee. If no member of the committee wishes to do so, then that is the end of it. Of course, the matter may be raised in the Senate. However, if no voting member of this committee wishes to raise the point, then I do not see how we can deal with it.

Senator Cools: That is rubbish!

Les renseignements dont je parlais ont manifestement été échangés entre des gens du ministère de la Justice et d'autres personnes dans tout le pays. Je ne crois pas que les membres de ce comité ont divulgué les renseignements. Je tiens à ce que ce soit clair, parce que je ne veux pas qu'on pense que c'est ce que je remettais en question.

Madame la présidente, vous avez dit que vous ne pouvez pas vous prononcer sur une question de privilège. Je connais très bien les règles à ce sujet. Quoi qu'il en soit, le comité peut décider d'examiner la question pour découvrir comment certaines personnes ont pu être en possession de ce genre de renseignements. Peut-être que le ministre pourrait venir nous l'expliquer, ou que des fonctionnaires du ministère pourraient revenir nous rencontrer pour le faire. À mon avis, des mesures s'imposent.

La présidente: Merci, sénateur. Cependant, le comité doit, pour procéder ainsi, en recevoir l'ordre du Sénat.

Le sénateur Cools: Dans ce cas, puisque je ne peux pas présenter de motion en ce sens, j'exhorte la présidente ou un membre du comité à proposer qu'on demande au Sénat d'étudier la question.

Le sénateur Grafstein: À titre de membre votant de ce comité, je pourrais peut-être signaler au sénateur Cools qu'une question de privilège doit d'abord et avant tout être soulevée et énoncée à la première occasion possible. Autrement dit, si les privilèges de quelqu'un sont lésés, la règle veut que ce soit le sénateur dont les privilèges auraient été lésés ou restreints qui soulève la question. Je suppose que c'est pourquoi le sénateur Cools nous a fait part du problème ici.

Cela dit, étant donné que le sénateur Cools a des raisons de croire que cette question porte atteinte à ses privilèges — et pourrait bien porter préjudice à d'autres personnes —, la manière appropriée pour le comité de traiter le problème qu'elle soulève est d'en prendre note. Je présume que nous l'avons déjà fait, puisque c'est inscrit au compte rendu. Si le sénateur tient à approfondir la question, elle devrait le faire devant l'ensemble des sénateurs au moment opportun, soit aujourd'hui même. Je ne me suis pas penché là-dessus, mais je suis toujours sensible aux privilèges des sénateurs. Je présume que c'est ainsi que se font les choses, mais je me fie au sénateur Beaudoin et à d'autres, qui connaissent peut-être mieux les règles que moi. J'ai quelque difficulté à comprendre le point de vue du sénateur Cools selon lequel un privilège a été enfreint parce qu'elle n'est pas un membre votant du comité. Je ne vois pas très bien en quoi cela porte atteinte à ses privilèges. À moins d'avis contraire, j'en conclus que cette question relève de l'ensemble des sénateurs.

J'inviterais le sénateur Beaudoin à faire des commentaires, puis nous pourrons poursuivre.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Pour soulever une question de privilège, il faut être membre du comité. Si aucun membre du comité ne veut le faire, c'est fini. Bien sûr, la question peut être soulevée au Sénat. Cependant, si aucun membre votant du comité ne veut soulever la question, je ne vois pas comment nous pourrons en traiter.

Le sénateur Cools: Foutaise!

The Chairman: No. Order!

Senator Nolin: We do not accept "rubbish." If we are to decide on this, I want to hear all the evidence or I do not want to discuss it. I do not think we have the mandate to discuss it. It is your privilege to raise this matter in the chamber and to table all the evidence you have. You will have to produce something. You are accusing a lot of people without mentioning names and I do not wish to be part of that. It is your right to do so in the chamber, but do not do it here.

Senator Cools: I would like to respond to that.

Senator Beaudoin: One cannot call an explanation of our rules "rubbish."

Senator Nolin: No, you cannot.

The Chairman: Order. I agree with Senator Beaudoin's comments. I would hope that the senator would retract the word "rubbish."

Senator Cools: The word "rubbish" was an aside. It was not intended to be a formal statement.

Senator Balfour: Earlier you insisted on being on the record.

Senator Cools: Perhaps I should repeat that it was never my intention, in any way, to impugn the integrity of any individual member of this committee. If my use of a particular word as an aside was inappropriate, I will apologize. That is not a problem. Magnanimity comes very easily to me.

In response to the substance of what was said, I should like to say that the rule of "earliest opportunity" does not apply here. It is only applied when the Senate Speaker's role is being invoked in what we call a prima facie case in the chamber. It is only invoked in that instance and then, prima facie, that response is whether or not the Speaker of the Senate chooses to give priority over all other debate. This subject matter is becoming increasingly not only arcane but also unknown to the majority of senators.

The fact of the matter is that Senate privileges are not "my" privileges. Senators hold them collectively. It is my understanding that it is our duty to uphold the rules at all times. Those rules provide that senators must request information in a certain way. One of those ways, honourable senators, is to introduce a motion in the house. One cannot simply demand information.

What I am introducing here is a sense of discussion —

The Chairman: Senator Cools, I have the chair!

Senator Cools: You certainly do.

The Chairman: I believe that this subject has been explored in great depth. At this point, we will proceed to clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-37.

It has been moved by Senator Moore that the committee complete clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-37. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

La présidente: Non. À l'ordre!

Le sénateur Nolin: Nous n'acceptons pas ici les termes comme «foutaise». Si nous devons prendre une décision à ce sujet, je tiens à entendre tous les faits, sinon je ne veux plus en entendre parler. Je ne crois pas que nous sommes mandatés pour discuter de ça. Vous avez le droit de soulever cette question au Sénat et de présenter toutes les preuves que vous avez. Il vous faudra en produire. Vous accusez des tas de gens sans donner de nom et je ne tiens pas à être mêlé à ça. Vous avez droit d'en parler au Sénat, mais pas ici.

Le sénateur Cools: J'aimerais répondre à ça.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Personne ne peut qualifier de «foutaise» une explication de nos règlements.

Le sénateur Nolin: Non, personne.

La présidente: À l'ordre. Je suis d'accord avec le sénateur Beaudoin. J'espère que le sénateur voudra bien retirer le mot «foutaise».

Le sénateur Cools: C'était un aparté. Ça ne se voulait pas une déclaration officielle.

Le sénateur Balfour: Vous avez pourtant insisté plus tôt pour que votre intervention soit consignée au compte rendu.

Le sénateur Cools: Je devrais peut-être répéter que je n'ai jamais eu la moindre intention de mettre en doute l'intégrité d'aucun membre de ce comité. Si l'expression que j'ai utilisée en aparté n'était pas convenable, je m'en excuse. Ce n'est pas là qu'est le problème. Je sais me montrer magnanime.

Pour en revenir à ce qui a été dit, j'aimerais souligner que la règle de la «première occasion» ne s'applique pas ici. Elle ne s'applique que lorsque le Président du Sénat doit déterminer si la question paraît fondée à première vue. Ce n'est que dans ce cas que cette règle peut être invoquée et le Président peut, à première vue, décider de donner ou non la priorité à cette question sur toutes les autres. Cette règle devient de plus en plus obscure et même ignorée pour la majorité des sénateurs.

Le fait est que les privilèges du Sénat ne sont pas uniquement les miens. Ils sont ceux de tous les sénateurs. D'après moi, nous avons le devoir d'observer les règles tout le temps. Ces règles prévoient que les sénateurs doivent suivre une certaine procédure pour obtenir des renseignements. Ils peuvent notamment les obtenir par voie de motion au Sénat. On ne peut pas tout simplement les exiger.

Ce que je suggère ici est une discussion...

Le président: Sénateur, c'est moi qui occupe le fauteuil!

Le sénateur Cools: Ça ne fait pas de doute.

La présidente: Il me semble que cette question a été amplement approfondie. Nous allons maintenant passer à l'étude détaillée du projet de loi C-37.

Le sénateur Moore propose que le comité procède à l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-37. Êtes-vous d'accord?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adopté.

Shall clause 1 carry? At this point, I should point out that the normal procedure, if we want to delete a clause, is to vote "No, it shall not carry."

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, when the clause is called.

The Chairman: The clause is now called. Shall clause 1 carry?

Senator Beaudoin: No.

Senator Nolin: No.

The Chairman: I declare the motion negatived.

Senator Cools: Usually when we move clause by clause, there is opportunity for discussion first.

The Chairman: Senator Cools, there was no offer for discussion on this one and the motion has been negatived.

Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed? Carried.

Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed? Carried.

Senator Cools: I was under the impression that when we move a clause we do it formally by motion. It takes more than to say, "Shall this carry? Carried." It seems to me that an individual moved it. I move that.

The Chairman: It has been moved by Senator Moore that we should go to clause-by-clause consideration of the bill, and that is what we are doing.

Senator Cools: I think the proper way to proceed is for Senator Moore to say, "I move that this clause carry" when we get to each clause. It should then be seconded. Otherwise, the bill is not properly voted on.

The Chairman: This is the format that we have traditionally been following in the committee.

Senator Beaudoin: When we have an omnibus motion, such as that moved by Senator Moore, we do not repeat ourselves 25 times.

Senator Nolin: It implies we are moving each and every clause.

Senator Beaudoin: That is right. It is up to the chair to call each clause separately but not each motion separately.

The Chairman: Precisely, and that is what I am doing.

We have now carried clause 3.

Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Est-ce que l'article 1 est adopté? Il convient de souligner que, selon la procédure, si nous voulons supprimer un article il faut voter «non, il n'est pas adopté».

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Oui, lorsqu'il est mis aux voix.

La présidente: L'article est maintenant mis aux voix. Est-ce que l'article 1 est adopté?

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Non.

Le sénateur Nolin: Non.

La présidente: Je déclare la motion rejetée.

Le sénateur Cools: Normalement, quand on fait une étude article par article, on peut d'abord discuter.

La présidente: Sénateur, personne n'a proposé de discuter de cet article, et la motion a été rejetée.

Est-ce que l'article 2 est adopté?

Des voix: Oui.

La présidente: Qui est contre? Adopté.

Est-ce que l'article 3 est adopté?

Des voix: Oui.

La présidente: Qui est contre? Adopté.

Le sénateur Cools: J'avais l'impression que, pour proposer un article, il fallait le faire formellement au moyen d'une motion. Ça devrait être plus que «est-ce que c'est adopté? Adopté». Il me semble que quelqu'un doit le proposer. C'est ce que je voudrais.

La présidente: Le sénateur Moore a proposé que nous fassions l'étude article par article du projet de loi, et c'est ce que nous faisons.

Le sénateur Cools: Je crois que pour faire les choses comme il se doit, le sénateur Moore devrait dire «je propose l'adoption de cet article» pour chaque article. Quelqu'un doit ensuite appuyer sa proposition. Autrement, le vote sur le projet de loi n'est pas fait selon les règles.

La présidente: Notre comité a toujours procédé de cette façon.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Lorsqu'une motion générale, comme celle du sénateur Moore, est présentée nous ne nous répétons pas 25 fois de suite.

Le sénateur Nolin: Ça sous-entend que nous proposons chacun des articles.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: C'est exact. Il incombe à la présidente de mettre chaque article aux voix, mais pas chaque motion.

La présidente: Précisément, et c'est ce que je fais.

Nous avons donc adopté l'article 3.

Est-ce que l'article 4 est adopté?

Des voix: Oui.

La présidente: Adopté.

Est-ce que l'article 5 est adopté?

Des voix: Oui.

La présidente: Adopté.

Shall clause 6 carry?

Senator Joyal: Honourable senators, on clause 6, I move the following amendment. Members of the committee have copies in English in French.

That Bill C-37 be amended, in clause 6,

(a) on page 3, by adding the following after line 7:

"(1.1) In conducting its inquiry, the commission shall consider

(a) the prevailing economic conditions in Canada, including the cost of living, and the overall economic and current financial position of the federal government;

(b) the role of financial security of the judiciary in ensuring judicial independence;

(c) the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary; and

(d) any other objective measure that the Commission considers relevant."; and

(b) on page 4, by replacing line 14 with the following:

"a report of the Commission within six months after receiving it."

[Translation]

In French, "Que le projet de loi C-37 soit modifié,

a) à la page 3, par adjonction, après la ligne 9, de ce qui suit:

(1.1) La commission fait son examen en tenant compte des facteurs suivants:

a) l'état de l'économie au Canada, y compris le coût de la vie ainsi que la situation économique et financière globale du gouvernement;

b) le rôle de la sécurité financière des juges dans la préservation de l'indépendance judiciaire;

c) le besoin de recruter les meilleurs candidats pour la magistrature;

d) tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent.";

[English]

Of course, the rest of the article follows.

Senator Nolin: I have a subamendment. I do not have it in writing because I thought it would be included in the amendment just read. In the French version, section 26, or clause 6 of the bill, paragraph 1 —

[Translation]

The French version contains a reference to "juges fédéraux" in line 2, whereas the English version makes no mention whatsoever of federal judges. Federal judges do not exist in the legislation. The only reference is to judges. In my subamendment, I propose that the reference to "juges fédéraux" in clause 6, paragraph 1,

Est-ce que l'article 6 est adopté?

Le sénateur Joyal: Honorables sénateurs, à propos de l'article 6, j'ai un amendement à proposer. Les membres du comité ont reçu copie en anglais et en français de l'amendement.

Que le projet de loi C-37 soit modifié, à l'article 6,

a) à la page 3, par adjonction, après la ligne 9, de ce qui suit:

«(1.1) La Commission fait son examen en tenant compte des facteurs suivants:

a) l'état de l'économie au Canada, y compris le coût de la vie ainsi que la situation économique et financière globale du gouvernement;

b) le rôle de la sécurité financière des juges dans la préservation de l'indépendance judiciaire;

c) le besoin de recruter les meilleurs candidats pour la magistrature;

d) tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent.»;

b) à la page 4, par substitution à la ligne 13, de ce qui suit:

«(7) Le ministre donne suite au rapport de la Commission au».

[Français]

En français, que l'article 6 soit modifié:

a) à la page 3, par adjonction, après la ligne 9, de ce qui suit:

«(1.1) La commission fait son examen en tenant compte des facteurs suivants:

a) l'état de l'économie au Canada, y compris le coût de la vie ainsi que la situation économique et financière globale du gouvernement;

b) le rôle de la sécurité financière des juges dans la préservation de l'indépendance judiciaire;

c) le besoin de recruter les meilleurs candidats pour la magistrature;

d) tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent.»;

[Traduction]

Bien entendu, le reste de l'article reste tel quel.

Le sénateur Nolin: J'aimerais proposer un sous-amendement. Je ne l'ai pas par écrit, parce que je croyais qu'il ferait partie de l'amendement qui vient d'être lu. Dans la version française, à l'article 26, ou à l'article 6 du projet de loi, au paragraphe 1...

[Français]

Dans la version française, on fait référence aux juges fédéraux à la deuxième ligne alors que dans la version anglaise, il n'y a aucune mention des juges fédéraux. Dans la loi, les juges fédéraux n'existent pas. Il existe des juges, point. Mon sous-amendement est de rayer du projet de loi C-37, article 6, line 2 of the French version of Bill C-37 be deleted. Unfortunately, I do not have this subamendment in writing.

[English]

Senator Beaudoin: I support that.

The Chairman: We are discussing this, Senator Cools, and I will give you an opportunity to speak.

Senator Joyal: I have no objection to including the proposed subamendment to the amendment which I have just read. Senator Nolin is right, there is no such qualification of judges in the English version of the bill. If we maintain "juges fédéraux," it could lead to confusion that we are dealing only with members of the Federal Court and not the other courts. That is certainly not the intention of the bill. We are dealing with the salary of all the judges appointed by the federal government, not only the Federal Court judges, but the Superior Court judges, the Court of Appeal judges, and so forth. The point raised by Senator Nolin is appropriate. It will not change the scope of the bill.

Senator Nolin: If we are on the discussion part of our consideration, in English, you have the word "Judicial" in the name of the commission. That word is not used in the French version.

Senator Grafstein: What word do they use in French?

Senator Nolin: In the name of the commission, there is no word like "judiciaire."

Senator Joyal: It is "Commission d'examen de la rémunération".

Senator Nolin: All of our judges are federal, first.

Senator Joyal: There is no doubt that if we maintain "juges fédéraux" in the French version, it could lead to some confusion in the interpretation of the mandate of the commission.

Senator Beaudoin: There is another reason. Both texts are equal according to law and the Constitution, and I think that is a major reason to eliminate the redundant word. We are talking about judges appointed by federal authority, but the expression "juges fédéraux" is not the best translation.

The Chairman: Our clerk is writing madly here. Senator Cools?

Senator Cools: I would submit to this committee, in particular to Senator Joyal and to the Liberal senators here, that this amendment has not received substantial and sufficient discussion in the Liberal Senate caucus. I would ask Senator Joyal if he would impose a limitation on himself, difficult as it would be, and that is to consider submitting this proposed amendment to our caucus and then —

Senator Beaudoin: On a point of order.

Senator Cools: I have not finished my remarks, but that is quite all right.

Senator Beaudoin: We are sitting in committee. What is going on in your caucus or in our caucus is immaterial.

clause 6, paragraphe 1, à la deuxième ligne, les mots «des juges fédéraux» uniquement dans la version française. Malheureusement, je ne l'ai pas par écrit.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Beaudoin: J'appuie cette proposition.

Le président: Nous allons en discuter, sénateur Cools, et vous pourrez prendre la parole.

Le sénateur Joyal: Je ne vois pas d'objection à incorporer le sous-amendement proposé à l'amendement que je viens de lire. Le sénateur Nolin a raison, la version anglaise de la loi ne qualifie pas les juges. Si nous conservons l'expression «juges fédéraux», ça pourrait prêter à confusion et donner à penser que nous ne parlons que des membres du tribunal fédéral et pas de ceux des autres tribunaux. Ce n'est certainement pas l'intention du projet de loi. Nous traitons des salaires de tous les juges désignés par le gouvernement fédéral, pas seulement de ceux des juges fédéraux, mais des juges du tribunal supérieur, de la Cour d'appel, et cetera. L'intervention du sénateur Nolin est donc pertinente. Ça ne changera pas la portée du projet de loi.

Le sénateur Nolin: Puisque nous discutons de ça, en anglais, il y a le terme «judicial» dans le titre de la commission. Il n'y a rien de tel dans la version française du titre.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Quel est le terme utilisé en français?

Le sénateur Nolin: On n'emploie pas, dans le titre de la commission, le mot «judiciaire».

Le sénateur Joyal: C'est la Commission d'examen de la rémunération.

Le sénateur Nolin: Tous les juges sont fédéraux, en premier lieu.

Le sénateur Joyal: Il n'y a pas de doute que si nous conservons les mots «juges fédéraux» dans la version française, ça pourrait porter à confusion dans l'interprétation du mandat de la commission.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Il y a une autre raison. En vertu de la loi et de la Constitution, les deux textes sont égaux, et je crois que c'est une raison suffisante pour éliminer les mots inutiles. Nous parlons des juges désignés par le pouvoir fédéral, mais l'expression «juges fédéraux» n'est pas la meilleure traduction qui soit.

La présidente: Le greffier écrit à toute vitesse. Sénateur Cools?

Le sénateur Cools: Je voudrais signaler au comité, en particulier au sénateur Joyal et aux sénateurs libéraux ici présents, que le caucus libéral du Sénat n'a pas eu l'occasion de discuter suffisamment de cet amendement. Je demanderai donc au sénateur Joyal de freiner son élan, aussi difficile que ça puisse être, et d'envisager de soumettre l'amendement qu'il propose à notre caucus, et puis...

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Comme rappel au Règlement.

Le sénateur Cools: Je n'ai pas fini de parler, mais c'est exactement où je veux en venir.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Nous siégeons à un comité, ce qui se passe dans votre caucus ou dans le nôtre importe peu.

The Chairman: I am not accepting that as a point of order, but I am accepting it as a valid point on this.

Senator Cools: My statement was cut off midstream. I was asking Senator Joyal to delay by a day or two, prior to proposing his amendment, so that this matter could be properly canvassed by the Liberal Senate caucus. I do not believe that I asked anything that was out of order. It is a very curious situation where the gentlemen across here are raising this as a potential point of order. I think I understand why. That is quite acceptable, because life unfolds as it does. I was making an appeal to Senator Joyal, since it is his amendment.

As I see it, it is not the government senators' amendment, because it has not been placed before us by the government sponsor of the bill. Thus, I must conclude that it is a personal amendment being moved by Senator Joyal. There is a big difference. Our government sponsors usually do certain things. If Senator Joyal wishes to comply with my request, I would submit, Senator Beaudoin, that it is no business of yours. I was putting it to Senator Joyal.

Senator Beaudoin: And my business is to point out that we are in committee. This committee does not need to know what is going on in your caucus or in my caucus.

Senator Cools: I am trying to ask a member whether he will consider delaying making a motion, and that is usually done at the point in time when that motion is made. I would like to hear Senator Joyal's response.

The Chairman: Order. Senator Joyal has heard your request. I do not believe that the caucus of any side of the Senate should be brought into discussions in this committee. It is up to Senator Joyal to decide whether he will agree to postpone these discussions, for whatever reason. Senator Cools, you did not have the floor.

Senator Joyal: Madam Chairman, we are now engaged in the process of voting on the proposed legislation clause by clause. I have suggested that we move forward, as that is our agenda for today. If there is any need for further discussion among certain members of this committee, that discussion will proceed outside the sitting this morning.

The Chairman: We shall proceed on the suggestions that have been made by Senator Nolin and Senator Joyal that Bill C-37 be amended, in the French version, by deleting, in clause 6 on page 3, line 4, the phrase "des juges fédéraux".

Senator Fraser: No, just the word "fédéraux".

Senator Joyal: That is right because the Judges Act defines which judges are covered by the Judges Act. Since it is an amendment to the Judges Act, the definition that is applied in that section is already contained in the Judges Act. Therefore, we should not create confusion. I feel that we should maintain the definition currently in the Judges Act. That is probably the most compelling argument in support of Senator Nolin's argument.

La présidente: Je n'accepte pas votre intervention comme un rappel au Règlement, mais j'admets que c'est un argument valable.

Le sénateur Cools: J'ai été interrompue dans ma lancée. Je demandais au sénateur Joyal de remettre sa proposition d'un jour ou deux afin de permettre au caucus libéral du Sénat de l'examiner de manière appropriée. Je ne pense pas demander l'impossible. Il est très curieux que ces messieurs, en face de moi, interprètent ça comme un éventuel rappel au Règlement. Je crois comprendre pourquoi. Ça se comprend très bien, parce que la vie suit son cours. Je m'adressais au sénateur Joyal, parce qu'il s'agit de son amendement.

Que je sache, cet amendement n'a pas été proposé par les sénateurs du parti ministériel, parce qu'il n'a pas été proposé par le parrain du projet de loi. J'en conclus donc qu'il s'agit d'un amendement que propose personnellement le sénateur Joyal. C'est très différent. Les parrains du parti ministériel procèdent généralement d'une certaine manière. Si le sénateur Joyal veut bien se plier à ma demande, je soutiendrais, sénateur Beaudoin, que ça ne vous regarde pas. C'est au sénateur Joyal que je m'adressais.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Ça me regarde, cependant, de souligner que nous sommes en comité. Ce comité n'a nullement besoin de savoir ce qui se passe dans votre caucus ou dans le mien.

Le sénateur Cools: J'essaie de demander à un membre du comité s'il veut bien envisager de reporter le dépôt d'une motion, et ce genre de requête se fait généralement lorsque la motion est présentée. J'aimerais entendre la réponse du sénateur Joyal.

La présidente: À l'ordre. Le sénateur Joyal a entendu votre requête. Je ne crois pas que le caucus ou n'importe quel parti représenté au Sénat devrait être mêlé aux discussions de ce comité. Il incombe au sénateur Joyal de décider s'il veut ou non reporter ces discussions, pour une raison ou une autre. Sénateur Cools, je ne vous avais pas donné la parole.

Le sénateur Joyal: Madame la présidente, nous avons entrepris l'adoption article par article du projet de loi à l'étude. Je suggère que nous poursuivions, puisque c'est l'objet de notre rencontre d'aujourd'hui. Si certains membres du comité veulent continuer de discuter, ils devraient le faire en dehors de la séance de ce matin.

La présidente: Nous revenons aux propositions du sénateur Nolin et du sénateur Joyal qui ont demandé d'amender la version française du projet de loi C-37, à l'article 6, de la page 3, ligne 4, en supprimant les mots «des juges fédéraux».

Le sénateur Fraser: Non, seulement le mot «fédéraux».

Le sénateur Joyal: C'est exact, parce que la Loi sur les juges définit les juges qu'elle vise. Étant donné qu'il s'agit d'une modification de la Loi sur les juges, la définition qui s'applique à cet article figure déjà dans la Loi sur les juges. Par conséquent, nous ne devons pas semer la confusion. Je crois que nous devons nous en tenir à la définition qui figure dans la Loi sur les juges. C'est probablement l'argument qui donne le plus de poids à la proposition du sénateur Nolin.

[Translation]

Senator Fraser: Still with respect to the translation, point (d) in the English version refers to "any other objective measure", while the French version refers to "de tout autre facteur". Should the word "objectif" be added to the French version or does the word "facteur" imply objectivity?

[English]

Senator Joyal: That is a very important point. Would Senator Fraser care to explain why she raised it?

Senator Fraser: I suggest that we insert the word "objectif" after the word "facteur" .

Senator Beaudoin: Two words or just one?

Senator Fraser: Just one.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: How would the amendment read then?

Senator Fraser: Right now, it reads "tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent". I am proposing that it to be amended to read "tout autre facteur objectif qu'elle considère pertinent".

[English]

Senator Joyal: In the English version we say "any other objective measure". There is a qualification in English which does not exist in the French version.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: "Objectif" is used as an adjective rather than as a noun. It would be inserted after the word "facteur".

[English]

The Chairman: Before we continue with amending clause 6, perhaps we should decide whether we will vote on the amendment to clause 1, in the French version, to delete the word "fédéraux".

Our researcher has something of interest to say on this.

Ms Nancy Holmes, Researcher: I should like to bring it to the attention of senators before they vote, that section 26 of the Judges Act does not use the reference "des juges fédéraux" with regard to establishing the commission.

Senator Beaudoin: What did they use?

Ms Holmes: They did not. They said:

[Translation]

> "Chargé d'examiner si les traitements et autres prestations prévues à la présente loi".

[English]

It continues in the same.

The Chairman: So the entire phrase is not there.

[Français]

Le sénateur Fraser: Toujours au niveau de la traduction, dans l'amendement d), en anglais on parle de «any other objective measure», et en français, il est écrit: «de tout autre facteur». Est-ce qu'on devrait insérer le mot «objectif» dans la version française ou est-ce que le mot «facteur» est lui-même un mot qui implique l'objectivité?

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Joyal: C'est certainement très important. Est-ce que le sénateur Fraser veut bien expliquer pourquoi elle a soulevé cette question?

Le sénateur Fraser: Je suggère que nous ajoutions le terme «objectif» après le terme «facteur».

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Deux mots ou un seul?

Le sénateur Fraser: Seulement un.

[Français]

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Comment cela se lirait-il?

Le sénateur Fraser: Présentement, nous avons: «tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent». Je suggère que l'on devrait l'amender pour «tout autre facteur objectif qu'elle considère pertinent».

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Joyal: Dans la version anglaise, nous disons «any other objective measure». L'anglais comporte donc une qualification qui n'est pas dans la version française.

[Français]

Le sénateur Nolin: Le mot «objectif» est utilisé comme adjectif plutôt que comme nom. Alors on ajoute le mot «objectif» après le mot «facteur».

[Traduction]

La présidente: Avant de poursuivre avec l'amendement de l'article 6, nous pourrions peut-être décider si nous allons mettre aux voix l'amendement de l'article 1, qui vise à supprimer le terme «fédéraux» dans la version française.

Notre attachée de recherche à quelque chose à dire là-dessus.

Mme Nancy Holmes, attachée de recherche: J'aimerais signaler aux sénateurs, avant qu'ils passent au vote, que l'article 26 de la Loi modifiant la Loi sur les juges ne contient pas de référence à «des juges fédéraux», en ce qui a trait à la mise sur pied de la commission.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Que dit-on?

Mme Holmes: On n'y fait pas référence. On dit:

[Français]

> «Chargé d'examiner si les traitements et autres prestations prévues à la présente loi».

[Traduction]

Et ça continue ainsi.

La présidente: Donc, on ne retrouve pas ces mots.

Senator Nolin: The act refers to the appointment of commissioners without naming the commission. Now we will have a name for that commission. In the English version of the name we have the word "judicial". In the French version we have "juges fédéraux". I am suggesting that we leave out the word "fédéraux". All our judges are "fédéraux".

The Chairman: At this point, I will put the question on the first amendment to clause 6, which is that Bill C-37 be amended, in the French version, by deleting, in clause 6 on page 3, line 4, the word "fédéraux". Will all those in favour of the amendment so indicate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Will all those opposed so indicate.

The amendment is carried.

We shall move to the second amendment.

Senator Grafstein: May I ask a question of Senator Joyal on the substance of the drafting? I have no difficulty with the principles. I just query the placement of "(a)" as opposed to "(b)". One of the fundamental principles and one of our concerns is the principle of judicial independence. I wondered whether "(b)" should be "(a)" and "(a)" should be "(b)". I raise this in the context that general principles should follow with specifics, as opposed to specific and then general. The key principle here is to sustain the principle of judicial independence.

Having said that, I then look at the wording of "(b)". While I think I understand the principle, to which I do not object, I wonder whether we could redraft it slightly. Just to illustrate my point, instead of using the phrase, "the role of financial security of the judiciary in ensuring judicial independence", I would suggest we start with, "to ensure judicial independence, the role of financial security of the judiciary." I would make that the first principle that describes what we are doing here. We are really trying to establish an objective standard for judicial independence, yet political accountability. Those are the two principles.

I am not suggesting that we make that change. I am only asking Senator Joyal, who has looked at this longer than I have, to tell me if that meets with his view. If it does not, I will not move it as an amendment.

Senator Joyal: Madam Chair, we all know that one of the fundamental principles is, of course, the independence of the judiciary from the legislative and the executive. Those principles are at the root of our parliamentary and constitutional system. To maintain the separation of the three powers, there are elements that the independence of the judiciary should be asserting. One of them, of course, is security of tenure. The second one is financial security. It is important that those elements be stated when we are dealing with compensation of the judiciary.

I personally have no opposition to the suggestion put forward by Senator Grafstein, as such. However, since we are addressing only one aspect of the independence of the judicial system, which is financial security — we are not dealing with security of tenure in this bill — I suggest that, in bringing forward the importance of Le sénateur Nolin: La loi fait référence à la nomination des commissaires sans nommer la commission. Cette commission aura un nom. Dans son nom en anglais, on retrouve le mot «judicial». Dans son nom en français, il est question des «juges fédéraux». Je propose qu'on enlève le mot «fédéraux». Tous nos juges sont «fédéraux».

La présidente: Je vais maintenant mettre aux voix le premier amendement de l'article 6 du projet de loi qui propose que le projet de loi C-37 soit modifié, dans sa version française, par suppression, à la ligne 4, du mot «fédéraux». Que tous ceux qui sont en faveur de l'amendement se manifestent.

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Que tous ceux qui sont contre se manifestent.

L'amendement est adopté.

Nous passons au deuxième amendement.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Puis-je poser une question au sénateur Joyal sur la façon dont l'amendement a été rédigé? Je ne remets pas en question les principes de l'amendement. Je m'interroge seulement sur l'ordre des alinéas a) et b). Un des principes fondamentaux qui nous préoccupent est celui de l'indépendance judiciaire. Je me demande si l'on ne devrait pas inverser l'ordre des alinéas b) et a), étant donné que les principes généraux doivent être énoncés avant les particularités et non l'inverse. Ce qui compte ici, c'est de confirmer le principe de l'indépendance judiciaire.

Cela dit, je me demande si on ne pourrait pas modifier légèrement la formulation de l'alinéa b) même si j'en comprends le principe et que je ne m'y oppose pas. Au lieu d'écrire «le rôle de la sécurité financière des juges dans la préservation de l'indépendance judiciaire», je proposerais d'intervertir l'ordre des mots pour commencer par «dans la préservation de l'indépendance judiciaire, le rôle de la sécurité financière des juges». J'aimerais qu'on énonce en premier le principe que nous voulons assurer. Ce que nous voulons vraiment faire ici c'est établir un critère objectif d'indépendance judiciaire, sans négliger la responsabilité politique. Ce sont les deux principes à garantir.

Je ne suis pas en train de proposer ce changement. Je veux simplement demander au sénateur Joyal, qui a étudié la question plus à fond que moi, si mon point de vue concorde avec le sien. S'il ne concorde pas, je ne proposerai pas l'amendement.

Le sénateur Joyal: Madame la présidente, nous savons tous que l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire par rapport au pouvoir législatif et au pouvoir exécutif est un principe fondamental. Ce principe est à la base de notre régime parlementaire et constitutionnel. Pour assurer la séparation des trois pouvoirs, il y a des éléments que l'indépendance judiciaire doit affirmer, dont bien sûr la sécurité du mandat. Il y a aussi la sécurité financière. Il est important de mentionner ces éléments quand on parle de la rémunération des juges.

Je n'ai personnellement rien contre la proposition faite par le sénateur Grafstein. Cependant, comme il n'est question ici que d'un aspect de l'indépendance du système judiciaire, à savoir la sécurité financière — étant donné qu'il n'est pas question de la sécurité du mandat dans ce projet de loi — je pense qu'en the financial security to the commission, as it is an essential element of their work, we not deal with the overall elements of the independence of the judiciary.

That, of course, involves security of tenure and so on. That is why it was phrased that way. Otherwise, we would need to enumerate the three elements that have been traditionally considered as the guarantees of judicial independence.

This is the best way we could find to state the principles which you just stated yourself and which are, in fact, at the root of any work of the commission. The commission works within the context of the independence of the judicial system and, in that context, it has a specific role to ensure that financial security is confirmed through the recommendation and the study that it makes. It gives the overall context in which the commission must work to prevent the discussion of the questions which were raised in the Supreme Court of Canada in the P.E.I. Reference case, which is: How do you define "financial security" versus "judicial independence"?

Of course, it brings forward the overall capacity of the commission to maintain a balance between that principle and the other prevailing economic conditions and so forth. In other words, there is not only the economic set of elements. There are also sets of elements which deal with the very structure of the independence of the judicial system, which, for instance, do not exist in compensation boards for the public service. The public service is not separated from the administration of the government, but the judicial system is totally separated from the administration of the government. It is important to state that principle when we are formally establishing a commission that has the responsibility to define how the element of financial security will be guaranteed in that context. That is why it is stated that way. I agree there are two ways to state the overall objective of the work of the commission, but I feel that the way it is stated now meets Senator Grafstein's preoccupation.

Senator Balfour: I do not wish to quibble over words with Senator Grafstein, but if I had been drafting the text, I think I would have stated "the necessity for" or "the need for" rather than "the role of", because that is what we are talking about. In order to have judicial independence, it is necessary that judges have financial security. We are not talking about a role; we are talking about a need.

The Chairman: I must say this clause has been the subject of a great deal of debate.

Senator Balfour: And I was not present for that.

Senator Joyal: I agree with Senator Balfour and Senator Grafstein. I should say, in a candid way, that the dictionary is full of words. That is the magic of language. Certainly we can state an objective and use a certain number of words to describe it without changing the very nature of what we want to say. My honourable colleagues will understand that I tried to draft a text which would meet the very point I was making in my remarks, that is, to be sure that this text is in conformity with our constitutional tradition soulignant à la commission l'importance de la sécurité financière des juges dans l'exécution de leur travail, nous n'avons pas à traiter de tous les éléments qui assurent l'indépendance judiciaire.

Parmi ces éléments, on retrouve la sécurité du mandat évidemment. C'est pourquoi l'amendement a été formulé de cette façon. Autrement, il faudrait énumérer les trois éléments qui sont normalement censés garantir l'indépendance judiciaire.

C'est la meilleure façon que nous avons trouvée pour énoncer les principes dont vous venez de parler vous-même et qui sont à la base de tous les travaux de la commission. La commission fonctionne dans le contexte de l'indépendance du système judiciaire et, dans ce contexte, elle a pour rôle précis de s'assurer que la sécurité financière des juges est confirmée dans les recommandations et les études qu'elle fait. C'est le contexte global dans lequel la commission doit travailler pour empêcher qu'on ait à se poser des questions comme celles qui ont été soulevées à la Cour suprême du Canada dans le Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, à savoir comment définir la «sécurité financière» par rapport à l'«indépendance judiciaire».

Bien sûr, ça suppose que la commission est capable de tenir compte à la fois de ce principe et de l'état de l'économie et le reste. Autrement dit, il n'y a pas seulement les aspects économiques qui entrent en ligne de compte. Il y a aussi des aspects qui ont trait à la structure même du système judiciaire indépendant et qui n'existent pas dans le cas des commissions de rémunération de la fonction publique. Contrairement à la fonction publique, le système judiciaire est complètement distinct de l'administration gouvernementale. Il est important d'énoncer ce principe quand nous créons officiellement une commission qui est chargée de définir comment la sécurité financière des juges sera garantie dans ce contexte. C'est pourquoi on a formulé ainsi la disposition. Je conviens qu'il y a deux façons de formuler l'objectif général du mandat de la commission, mais j'estime que celle qui a été utilisée répond à la préoccupation du sénateur Grafstein.

Le sénateur Balfour: Ce n'est pas que je veuille pinailler sur le choix des mots avec le sénateur Grafstein, mais si j'avais rédigé ce texte, j'aurais employé les mots «nécessité» ou «besoin» plutôt que «rôle», parce que c'est ce dont nous parlons. Pour assurer l'indépendance judiciaire, il est nécessaire que les juges aient une sécurité financière. Nous ne parlons pas d'un rôle, mais d'un besoin.

La présidente: Je dois dire que cette disposition a fait l'objet d'un long débat.

Le sénateur Balfour: Auquel je n'ai pas assisté.

Le sénateur Joyal: Je suis d'accord avec le sénateur Balfour et le sénateur Grafstein. Je dois dire, bien honnêtement, qu'il y a plein de mots dans le dictionnaire. C'est la magie de la langue. Il est certain qu'on peut formuler un objectif de différentes façons sans changer l'essence même de ce que nous voulons dire. Mes collègues comprendront que j'ai essayé de rédiger un texte qui respecte ce que j'ai souligné, c'est-à-dire qui soit conforme à la tradition et aux obligations de notre Constitution sur la séparation and our constitutional obligations of separation of power. I was conscious of choosing the terms to be sure that they were acceptable in the context of our legal tradition.

At this point, while I know that those of us who are lawyers or who have discussed legal concepts can express principles in various ways, I would be tempted to maintain this one as it stands, taking into account the research and discussion I had with the legal adviser on the selection of these words.

I understand your point. It is part of the overall essential of judicial independence that we want to maintain through the capacity of the commission to ensure that judges have financial security.

Senator Beaudoin: I think we have discussed this ad nauseam, because it is only one point out of three in the Valenti case. I am ready to accept this as it is.

The Chairman: May I ask your opinions on point "(d)", Senator Joyal and others?

Senator Joyal: I would like to hear the opinion of my colleagues before I make my comments on that, Madam Chairman.

The Chairman: We are referring to the change suggested by Senator Fraser in the French version of "1.1(d)", that the word "objectif" be added after the word "facteur".

Senator Beaudoin: I have a problem with that. Look at this.

[Translation]

The French version reads "La Commission fait son examen en tenant compte des facteurs suivants", namely (a), (b), (c) and (d), "tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent.

[English]

I think if we change any version, it should be the English version which states that the commission shall consider. There is no mention of the objective or the measure. It states, shall consider "(a), (b), (c), (d)" and any other objective measure. It has been translated as "tout autre facteur".

[Translation]

When you say "tout autre facteur", this implies objectivity.

Senator Joyal: No, not necessarily.

[English]

Senator Beaudoin: A factor is something that exists. It exists or it does not exist.

Senator Grafstein: That point is well taken. In the P.E.I. Reference case, one of the overlapping issues was the need for objective criteria. "Criteria" is better than "objective measures". I can bring a criterion to bear. I can say that I think everyone who has a certain colour of hair should be treated in a certain way. That, to my mind, is an arbitrary criterion. On the other hand, if I say judges who are disabled should be treated in a certain way, then I move from the arbitrary to the general. I think that "objectif" means those objective, non-arbitrary factors. We do not want the commission to say, "By the way, this was our des pouvoirs. Je me suis employé à choisir des mots qui allaient être acceptables sur le plan juridique.

Même si je sais que ceux d'entre nous qui sont avocats ou discutent de concepts juridiques peuvent exprimer des principes de différentes façons, je serais tenté de défendre la formulation que j'ai choisie compte tenu des recherches que j'ai faites et des discussions que j'ai eues avec un conseiller juridique sur le choix des mots.

Je comprends votre point de vue. Ça fait partie du principe général de l'indépendance de la magistrature que nous voulons maintenir en permettant à la commission de s'assurer que les juges ont une sécurité financière.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Je pense que nous avons discuté de cela ad nauseam parce que c'est seulement un des trois points traités dans l'affaire Valenti. Je suis prêt à accepter la disposition telle quelle.

La présidente: Puis-je vous demander votre avis sur l'alinéa d), sénateur Joyal et d'autres?

Le sénateur Joyal: J'aimerais d'abord entendre l'opinion de mes collègues avant de donner la mienne, madame la présidente.

La présidente: Je parle de la modification proposée par le sénateur Fraser à la version française de l'alinéa 1.1*d*) pour faire ajouter le mot «objectif» après le mot «facteur».

Le sénateur Beaudoin: J'y vois un problème. Regardez bien.

[Français]

«La Commission fait son examen en tenant compte des facteurs suivants, a), b), c) et à d), tout autre facteur qu'elle considère pertinent.»

[Traduction]

À mon avis, si on change l'une ou l'autre version, ce devrait être la version anglaise parce qu'il n'y est pas question de l'objectif ou de la mesure que la commission doit examiner. On dit que la commission examine a), b), c) et d), toute autre mesure objective. On a traduit ce passage par «tout autre facteur».

[Français]

Si vous dites tout autre facteur, le facteur est toujours objectif.

Le sénateur Joyal: Non, pas nécessairement.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Un facteur est quelque chose qui existe ou qui n'existe pas.

Le sénateur Grafstein: On en prend note. Dans le Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, il est question de la nécessité d'avoir des critères objectifs. Le mot «critères» vaut mieux que les mots «objective measures» utilisés en anglais. Je peux établir un critère à prendre en considération. Je peux dire que tous ceux qui ont les cheveux d'une certaine couleur doivent être traités d'une certaine façon. D'après moi, c'est un critère arbitraire. En revanche, si je dis que les juges qui ont un handicap devraient être traités d'une certaine façon, je passe de l'arbitraire au général. Je pense que le mot thought." If they have a thought, it must be a generally accepted criterion. It is almost like the notion of generally accepted accounting principles.

The Chairman: Before we go further, it may be of interest to you to note that, in the P.E.I. Reference case, they must make recommendations on judges' remuneration by reference to objective criteria. This is where the reference comes from.

Senator Beaudoin: Objective criteria is much better. I think we should change it to that expression.

Senator Grafstein: How would that be translated in French?

The Chairman: Senator Nolin has the floor.

Senator Nolin: Of course, we can change the word "measure" to "criteria", but the intent of Senator Fraser's amendment was to add —

[Translation]

— if you look at the three first factors or criteria listed, clearly, they are all objective. There is no need to qualify them. However, in subparagraph 4, because they are no longer defined, these factors need to be qualified. The commission has the flexibility to choose on its own those measures or criteria that it deems necessary. These criteria should be objective. It is quite appropriate to insert the word "objective", but only in subparagraph 4.

[English]

Senator Beaudoin: In the P.E.I. Reference case, they referred to objective criteria. That decision is also available in French. What does it say in French?

The Chairman: We do not have the French version of the P.E.I. Reference case here. We will try to get it off the Internet.

Senator Joyal: To continue on the point raised by Senator Nolin, I would remind you that the concept came from the P.E.I. Reference case. In my opinion, it was important. The basis of this amendment is that the mandate of the commission be circumscribed. The court clearly mentioned it had one element in mind when it stated that objective. In other words, it did not want to leave the commission with an open-ended mandate to make recommendations that could not be measured by objective criteria. That is my interpretation of the decision, and that is what I think we understand here.

When I was drafting the amendment, I thought it important that the word "objective" be maintained. It qualifies the various elements that the commission would take into consideration in making recommendations. I thought it was necessary to add a certain number of examples of criteria, such as the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary. That idea came from the Scott commission. Honourable senators will remember that when Mr. Scott was here, he testified in that regard.

La présidente: Avant de poursuivre, il peut être intéressant de noter que, selon le Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, la commission doit formuler des recommandations sur la rémunération des juges en s'appuyant sur des critères objectifs. C'est de là que viennent ces mots.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Les mots «objectives criteria» valent beaucoup mieux. Je pense que nous devrions les employer à la place.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Comment les traduirait-on en français?

La présidente: La parole est au sénateur Nolin.

Le sénateur Nolin: Évidemment, nous pourrions changer le mot «measure» par «criteria», mais le changement proposé par le sénateur Fraser visait à ajouter...

[Français]

... en français, le mot objectif. Si vous regardez l'énumération des trois premiers facteurs ou critères, ils sont de toute évidence objectifs. On n'a pas besoin de les qualifier à ce moment. Mais au quatrième alinéa, il faut absolument le préciser parce qu'ils ne sont plus définis à ce moment. On laisse la Commission libre de choisir elle-même les facteurs ou critères qu'elle jugera nécessaire afin de l'influencer. On veut bien que ces critères soient objectifs. Il est à propos d'ajouter le mot objectif uniquement au quatrième sous-alinéa.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Dans le Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, il est question de critères objectifs. La décision a été traduite. Que dit-on en français?

La présidente: Nous n'avons pas la version française du renvoi ici. Nous essayerons de nous la procurer sur Internet.

Le sénateur Joyal: Pour revenir à ce que disait le sénateur Nolin, j'aimerais vous rappeler que ce concept vient du Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard. À mon avis, c'est important. L'amendement vise à circonscrire le mandat de la commission. La cour a bien indiqué l'intention qu'elle avait en énonçant cet objectif. Autrement dit, elle ne voulait pas que la commission puisse formuler des recommandations qui ne pourraient pas s'appuyer sur des critères objectifs. C'est ainsi que j'interprète la décision et c'est aussi ce que nous en pensons ici, je crois.

Quand j'ai rédigé l'amendement, j'ai jugé qu'il était important de conserver le mot «objectif». Il qualifie les divers éléments que la commission examinerait pour formuler ses recommandations. J'ai cru bon d'énoncer certains critères, comme le besoin de recruter les meilleurs candidats pour la magistrature. J'ai tiré cet exemple de ce qu'a produit la commission Scott. Mes collègues se rappelleront que M. Scott a parlé en ce sens quand il est venu témoigner devant nous.

As well, the prevailing economic conditions in Canada, including the cost of living, must be taken into account. It is mentioned in the P.E.I. Reference decision as an objective criterion. The overall economic and current financial position of the federal government is also an objective criterion.

If we are to allow the commission the capacity to do its work, then it must be able to consider other criteria, but in an objective manner. In other words, it must consider criteria that are justified, ones that are measured on objective grounds. That is why the word "objective" is so important.

I certainly support the suggestion of Senator Fraser in that regard; the word "criteria" is part of the sense of that amendment.

The Chairman: It is in the French version of the P.E.I. decision as well.

Senator Joyal: We agree that we must ensure that the English and French versions are as similar as possible.

The Chairman: We cannot change the wording after we have passed it. Therefore, we should have the exact wording before us before we vote.

We can come back to it later. We will leave the staff to worry about it.

We will move on to part "(b)" of clause 6, on page 4. Do you have a further amendment, Senator Joyal?

Senator Joyal: Yes, Madam Chairman. It is essentially a matter of clarification.

I move that Bill C-37 be amended at paragraph "(b)", on page 4, by replacing line 14 with the following:

> "a report of the Commission within six months after receiving it.".

The French amendment would read:

[Translation]

Paragraph:

> b) à la page 4, par substitution à la ligne 13, de ce qui suit:
> "(7) Le ministre donne suite au rapport de la Commission au".

...within six months of receiving it. The six-month period remains in effect. We are talking here about the commission's report. This provision can be somewhat confusing, as it is not clear if we are talking about the commission's report or about Parliament's report.

Senator Beaudoin: Does the French version make no mention of this six-month period?

Senator Joyal: Yes, the text continues on line 14.

Senator Beaudoin: And that is where mention is made of the six-month period?

Il faut également tenir compte de l'état de l'économie au Canada, et notamment du coût de la vie. Dans la décision rendue dans le Renvoi relatif aux juges de la Cour provinciale de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, cet aspect est considéré comme un critère objectif. La situation économique et financière du gouvernement fédéral est aussi un critère objectif.

Pour pouvoir remplir son mandat, la commission doit pouvoir étudier d'autres critères, mais de façon objective. Autrement dit, elle doit examiner des critères qui sont justifiés, des critères qui peuvent être évalués sur une base objective. Voilà pourquoi le mot «objectif» est si important.

J'approuve tout à fait la proposition du sénateur Fraser à ce sujet; le mot «criteria» donne en partie son sens à cet amendement.

La présidente: Il est aussi employé dans la version française de la décision sur le renvoi de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard.

Le sénateur Joyal: Nous convenons qu'il faut nous assurer que les versions anglaise et française se ressemblent le plus possible.

La présidente: Nous ne pouvons pas changer le libellé après l'avoir adopté. Nous devons donc avoir le libellé exact avant de nous prononcer.

Nous pouvons y revenir plus tard. Nous laisserons le soin au personnel de s'en occuper.

Nous passons à la partie b) de l'article 6, à la page 4. Avez-vous un autre amendement, sénateur Joyal?

Le sénateur Joyal: Oui, madame la présidente. Il s'agit simplement d'un éclaircissement.

Je propose que le projet de loi C-37 soit modifié, à la page 4, par substitution à la ligne 14 de la version anglaise de ce qui suit:

> «a report of the Commission within six months after receiving it.»

Voici le libellé de l'amendement en français:

[Français]

Paragraphe:

> b) à la page 4, par substitution à la ligne 13, de ce qui suit:
> « (7) Le ministre donne suite au rapport de la Commission au »

... plus tard six mois après l'avoir reçu. On maintient la période de six mois. C'est le rapport de la commission dont on parle. L'article peut porter à confusion si c'est le rapport de la commission ou le rapport du Parlement.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: C'est parce qu'en français, on ne parle pas du six mois?

Le sénateur Joyal: Oui, il y a un six mois. On continue avec le texte de la ligne 14.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Et là, il y a le six mois?

Senator Joyal: Precisely. The only thing added to the French version is "de la Commission" because it is not clear which report is being referred to. It is purely a technicality.

[English]

I think we all understand the point.

The Chairman: At this point, rather than voting on part "(b)," we will go back to part "(a)" because we now have the wording.

Because there are changes to both the English and French versions, we will have to vote on both versions. We will start with the English version. Senator Joyal, will you restate the amendment?

Senator Joyal: The amendment to paragraph "(d)" states:

> "any other objective criteria that the Commission considers relevant.";

The Chairman: Shall the English version of clause 6, as further amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Rather than reading the entire clause, it has been moved by Senator Joyal that paragraph "(d)" read:

[Translation]

> Tout autre critère objectif qu'elle considère pertinent.

Senator Beaudoin: Perfect.

[English]

Senator Nolin: In the introduction of "1.1" we have the word "facteur". We must change that to "critère". I want to ensure that we are talking about the same thing.

Senator Joyal: Personally, I would prefer "facteur" in both paragraph "1.1" and in subparagraph "(d)".

Senator Nolin: My point is to use the same wording in both places.

Senator Beaudoin: But what will we use?

Senator Joyal: We will use the word "facteur".

[Translation]

Senator Joyal: "Facteur."

Senator Nolin: The correct word is "facteur."

Senator Beaudoin: However, in point d), we would use "critère objectif"?

Senator Joyal: No, we would use "facteur" to maintain agreement with paragraph 1.1.

Senator Beaudoin: And what do we do with the English version?

[English]

The Chairman: What Senator Joyal is moving is to change his amendment to read, in part "(d)":

Le sénateur Joyal: Oui, exactement. Ce qu'on ajoute tout simplement dans la version française c'est «de la Commission» parce qu'on ne sait pas de quel rapport on parle. C'est purement une technicalité.

[Traduction]

Je crois que nous comprenons tous le point.

La présidente: Maintenant, plutôt que de voter à l'égard de la partie «b)»,nous allons revenir à la partie «a)» vu que nous avons le libellé

Vu qu'il y a des changements et à la version anglaise et à la version française, il nous faudra voter sur les deux versions. Nous commençons par la version anglaise. Sénateur Joyal, auriez-vous l'obligeance de reformuler l'amendement?

Le sénateur Joyal: L'amendement proposé au paragraphe «d)» stipule:

> «any other objective criteria that the Commission considers relevant.»;

La présidente: La version anglaise de l'article 6 modifié est-elle adoptée?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adoptée.

Plutôt que de lire l'article au complet, il est proposé par le sénateur Joyal que l'alinéa d) se lise comme suit:

[Français]

> Tout autre critère objectif qu'elle considère pertinent.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: C'est parfait.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Nolin: Dans l'introduction de «1.1», nous avons le mot «facteurs». Nous devons le remplacer par «critères». Je veux être sûr que nous parlons de la même chose.

Le sénateur Joyal: Personnellement, je préférerais «facteurs» tant au paragraphe «1.1» qu'à l'alinéa «d)».

Le sénateur Nolin: Ce que je veux, c'est qu'on utilise le même mot aux deux endroits.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Mais lequel utiliserons-nous?

Le sénateur Joyal: Nous utiliserons le mot «facteurs».

[Français]

Le sénateur Joyal: «facteur».

Le sénateur Nolin: Le vrai mot est «facteur ».

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Mais dans d) ce serait «critère objectif»?

Le sénateur Joyal: Non, «facteur», parce qu'on maintient la concordance avec le paragraphe (1.1).

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Et en anglais, qu'est-ce qu'on fait?

[Traduction]

La présidente: Ce que propose le sénateur Joyal, c'est de modifier son amendement pour que l'alinéa «d)» se lise comme suit:

[Translation]

Tout autre facteur objectif qu'elle considère pertinent.

[English]

All in favour?

Senator Beaudoin: If we leave the word "criteria" in, it is included in "facteur".

Senator Joyal: I totally agree with Senator Beaudoin that in the definition "criteria" is part of "facteur". To ensure that the concordance is maintained, we should include the word "facteur". One includes the other.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

Carried.

That clause 6 be further amended by substituting at line 14:

"a report of the Commission within six months after receiving it."

I am informed that the French works as well.

All those in favour of the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

Carried.

Shall clause 6, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

Carried.

Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

Carried.

Shall clause 8 carry?All those in favour?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: I declare clause 8 carried.

Shall clause 9 carry? All those in favour?

Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

I declare clause 9 negatived.

Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: I declare clause 10 negatived.

Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: I declare clause 11 negatived.

[Français]

Tout autre facteur objectif qu'elle considère pertinent.

[Traduction]

Tous ceux qui sont en faveur de l'amendement.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Le mot «facteur» traduit bien le mot «critère», Le sénateur Joyal: Je suis tout à fait d'accord avec le sénateur Beaudoin. Pour assurer la concordance, nous devrions utiliser le mot «facteur», l'un incluant l'autre.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont en faveur de l'amendement?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont contre.

Adopté.

Que l'article 6 soit de nouveau modifié par substitution à la ligne 14 du texte anglais par ce qui suit:

«a report of the Commission within six months after receiving it.»

On m'informe que ça va aussi pour le texte français.

Tous ceux qui sont en faveur de l'amendement.

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Quels sont ceux qui sont contre?

Adopté.

L'article 6 modifié est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont contre?

Adopté.

L'article 7 est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont contre.

Adopté.

L'article 8 est-il adopté? Tous ceux qui sont pour?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: L'article 8 est adopté.

L'article 9 est-il adopté? Tous ceux qui sont pour?

Des voix: Non.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont contre.

L'article 9 est rejeté.

L'article 10 est-il adopté?

Des voix: Non.

La présidente: L'article 10 est rejeté.

L'article 11 est-il adopté?

Des voix: Non.

La présidente: L'article 11 est rejeté.

There are no changes to clauses 12 to 20. Shall we consider them en masse?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Beaudoin: I wish to confirm one thing. Clause 12 refers to amending section 47. It mentions the word "enfant".

[Translation]

I trust it is not related to the question of the surviving spouse.

Senator Nolin: No, it has to do with the question of children.

Senator Beaudoin: Shall this clause carry?

[English]

Senator Beaudoin: My concerns have been addressed. I wanted to be sure.

The Chairman: Shall clauses 12 to 20 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Opposed?

Carried.

Shall clause 21 carry?

Senator Joyal: Madam Chairman, taking into account that we have amended the previous clauses of the bill, I would like to move an amendment to ensure that we are consistent with the previous clauses of the bill. I would like to move that Bill C-37 be amended in clause 21, on page 13, by replacing lines 1 to 3 with the following:

"21. Sections 2, 3, 7 and 14 to 20 come into force on a day or"

[Translation]

In French, the amendment would read as follows:

Que le projet de loi C-37, à l'article 21, soit modifié, par substitution, aux lignes 3 à 5, page 13, de ce qui suit:

"21. Les articles 2, 3, 7, et 14 à 20 entrent en vigueur à la date".

And it goes on to say on line 6 "à la date fixée par décret".

Senator Nolin: The coming-into-force date is determined by an order of the Governor in Council. A question just occurred to me. I did not put any questions to the department's witnesses when they testified before the committee. Since the coming into force of these amendments affects remuneration, does this clause not put some power in the hands of the executive? Could this not be perceived as the executive branch exercising some control over remuneration? Why would the bill not come into force on the day it receives Royal Assent?

Senator Joyal: I would not venture to speak on behalf of the justice department or the Minister of Justice, but I do believe that some provisions have been put in place.

[English]

One of the main reasons this provision has been added is that there are elements in the bill which needed further consultation with the various levels of the judiciary. In particular, in Ontario, Aucun changement n'est proposé aux articles 12 à 20. Les membres acceptent-ils de les étudier en bloc?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Je veux confirmer une chose. L'article 12 porte modification de l'article 7. On utilise le mot «enfant».

[Français]

J'espère que ce n'est pas relié au conjoint survivant.

Le sénateur Nolin: Non, c'est toute la question des enfants.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Adopté?

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Mes craintes sont apaisées. Je voulais être sûr.

La présidente: Les articles 12 à 20 sont-ils adoptés?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Tous ceux qui sont contre.

Adopté.

L'article 21 est-il adopté?

Le sénateur Joyal: Madame la présidente, étant donné que nous avons modifié ces articles du projet de loi, j'aimerais proposer un amendement qui en assurera la conformité avec les dispositions précédentes du projet de loi. J'aimerais proposer que le projet de loi C-37, à l'article 21, soit modifié par substitution, aux lignes 3 à 5, page 13, de ce qui suit.

«21. Sections 2, 3, 7 and 14 to 20 come into force on a day or»

[Français]

En français, l'amendement se lirait:

Que le projet de loi C-37, à l'article 21, soit modifié, par substitution, aux lignes 3 à 5, page 13, de ce qui suit:

« 21. Les article 2, 3, 7, 14 à 20 entrent en vigueur à la date».

Et le texte français se poursuit. C'est à la date fixée par décret, à la fin de la ligne six.

Le sénateur Nolin: Ce sera un décret du pouvoir exécutif. La question me vient à l'instant et je n'ai pas posé de questions aux témoins du ministère lorsqu'ils sont venus témoigner. Comme la mise en vigueur de ces amendements inclut la rémunération, est-ce qu'il n'y a pas, dans cet article de mise en vigueur, un pouvoir entre les mains du pouvoir exécutif? Cela ne pourrait-il pas être perçu comme un contrôle de la rémunération? Pourquoi le projet de loi ne viendrait-il pas en vigueur carrément au moment de sa sanction?

Le sénateur Joyal: Je pense qu'il y a des dispositions, enfin, je ne veux pas risquer de parler au nom du ministère de la Justice ou du ministre de la Justice, certainement pas.

[Traduction]

Cette disposition a été ajoutée en grande partie parce que le projet de loi comporte des éléments qui nécessitaient une consultation plus poussée avec divers paliers de l'appareil there are discussions about the establishment of the new judges of the family court, and so forth. That is why there are elements that require further discussion with other parties and the necessity of clause 21.

Normally legislation comes into force on the day of its Royal Assent. However, because of the particular elements in the bill with respect to the provincial court, the coming into effect of the bill is fixed by an order of the Governor in Council.

Senator Beaudoin: Having regard to the complexity of the statute, I do not think it detracts from the independence of the judiciary. I understand your point because if the executive branch chooses to delay, the judges may interpret that as going against the independence of the judges." However, in my opinion, this is purely technical, and I would not worry about it.

Senator Nolin: My concern relates to clause 5. As I see it, clause 5 is not included in here. Therefore, I can backtrack on my earlier comments. Clause 5 is the remuneration clause.

Senator Joyal: However, it is not included.

[Translation]

The amendments pertain to clauses 2,3,7, 14 and 20.

Senator Nolin: I withdraw my comments in that case.

[English]

The Chairman: If I may clarify, these technical amendments are being put in because, in conjunction with Ontario's Bill 79, which would rename certain courts of Ontario, clauses 2, 3 and 7 and the transitional provisions of Bill C-37 would make corresponding amendments to various pieces of legislation, including the Judges Act.

Senator Nolin: I would ask members of this committee to forget my previous comments. The Constitution gives that power to Parliament, not to the executive branch of the government.

Senator Beaudoin: It is the power of the purse.

Senator Joyal: It is important that we know which parts of the bill are subject to a decree of the Governor in Council, taking into account the principle of the separation of power, which we discussed this morning. We must be clear that what we are doing is in strict conformity with the separation of power.

The Chairman: The question then is on the amendment to clause 21. All those in favour of the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All those opposed?

Carried.

Shall clause 21, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Shall the title carry?

judiciaire. Plus particulièrement, en Ontario, il est question de l'installation des nouveaux juges du tribunal de la famille, et cetera. C'est la raison pour laquelle il s'y trouve des éléments qui nécessitent une discussion plus poussée avec d'autres parties et l'ajout de l'article 21.

D'habitude la loi entre en vigueur au moment de la sanction royale. Cependant, étant donné les éléments particuliers du projet de loi en ce qui concerne la cour provinciale, l'entrée en vigueur est fixée par décret

Le sénateur Beaudoin: Étant donné la complexité de la loi, je ne crois pas qu'elle s'éloigne de l'indépendance du pouvoir judiciaire. Je comprends votre point étant donné que si le pouvoir exécutif choisit de reporter l'entrée en vigueur, les juges pourraient interpréter cela comme allant à l'encontre de leur indépendance. Cependant il s'agit selon moi d'une modification purement technique et je ne m'inquiéterais pas.

Le sénateur Nolin: Je m'interroge au sujet de l'article 5. De la façon dont je vois les choses, l'article 5 n'est pas inclus ici. Par conséquent, je peux retirer ce que j'ai dit. L'article 5 est celui où il est question du calcul du traitement.

Le sénateur Joyal: Cependant, il n'est pas inclus.

[Français]

Ce sont les article 2, 3, 7,14 et 20.

Le sénateur Nolin: Je retire mes commentaires.

[Traduction]

La présidente: Si je peux éclairer votre lanterne, ces amendements techniques sont présentés parce que, conjointement avec le projet de loi 79 de l'Ontario, qui renommerait certains tribunaux de l'Ontario, les articles 2, 3 et 7 de même que les dispositions transitoires du projet de loi C-37 apporteraient des modifications qui s'imposent à diverses mesures législatives, y compris la Loi sur les juges.

Le sénateur Nolin: Je demande aux membres du comité d'oublier ce que j'ai dit. La Constitution donne ce pouvoir au Parlement et non à l'exécutif.

Le sénateur Beaudoin: C'est le pouvoir du Trésor public.

Le sénateur Joyal: Il est important que nous sachions quelles sont les parties du projet de loi qui sont assujetties à un décret, en tenant compte du principe de la séparation des pouvoirs dont nous avons discuté ce matin. Nous devons nous assurer de respecter la séparation des pouvoirs.

La présidente: La mise aux voix porte sur l'amendement proposé à l'article 21. Tous ceux qui sont en faveur de l'amendement?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Quels sont ceux qui s'y opposent?

Adopté.

L'article 21 modifié est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adopté.

Le titre est-il adopté?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Shall the bill, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Is it agreed that the clauses of the bill be renumbered appropriately?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Shall I report the bill, as amended, to the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: That completes our agenda for today, honourable senators.

The committee adjourned.

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adopté.

Le projet de loi modifié est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adopté.

Plaît-il aux membres du comité que les articles du projet de loi soient renumérotés correctement?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Adopté.

Dois-je faire rapport du projet de loi modifié au Sénat?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Hororables sénateurs, nous avons épuisé notre ordre du jour.

La séance est levée.

JUDICIAL COMPENSATION AND BENEFITS COMMISSION

CANADIAN JUDICIAL COUNCIL

> judges' salaries and the remuneration of those senior federal public servants whose skills, experience and levels of responsibilities most closely parallel those of the Judiciary. We agree with the substance of the observation by both the Courtois and Scott Commissions (1990 and 1996) that the relationship between the remuneration of DM-3s and judges should be maintained, not as a precise measure of "value" but as a reflection of "what the marketplace expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by deputy ministers and judges." [32]

61. There are no circumstances or reasons that would justify this Commission to reach a different conclusion. The conclusion was valid then and it remains valid today.

62. It is noted that while previous judicial compensation commissions, including the Drouin Commission, have often referred to the notion of rough equivalence with the midpoint of the salary range of DM-3s, the correct expression of the principle is rough equivalence with the midpoint of the salary range of the most senior level of deputy minister.[33] That is because from 1975 until early 2001 the most senior level of deputy minister was the DM-3 and, therefore, the two formulations of the principle were synonymous.

63. Since the Drouin Report was submitted to the Minister of Justice on May 31, 2000, a higher level of deputy minister was created, the DM-4. The judiciary has been advised by the Government that the DM-4 level was created on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Senior Level Retention and Compensation (the "Strong Committee"), in recognition of the Government's view that certain DM-3 positions were larger in scope and clearly at a higher level of responsibility. According to the Government, it was felt that the creation of a more senior level, restricted to a very small number of people, would ensure equity with chief executive officers of some of the larger Crown corporations, and allow the Government to retain what was perceived as critical expertise at that level.

64. The judiciary has been informed that only two deputy ministers are currently paid at the DM-4 level. They are: the Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, and the Deputy Minister of Finance.

32 Drouin Report (2000) at 30-31 [underlining added].

33 See e.g. Guthrie Report (1987) at 8.

65. As mentioned earlier in these submissions, judicial salaries have traditionally been compared with the midpoint of the salary range of the most senior level of deputy minister. The application of this benchmark would justify comparing judicial salaries either with the midpoint of the salary range of DM-4s, or, alternatively, with the midpoint of the salary range of the DM-3 and DM-4 levels taken together as a single category.

66. The creation of the DM-4 category is recent and its composition appears still to be in a state of flux. The Association and Council understand that initially, only the Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet was paid at this level, and that the Deputy Minister of Finance was only subsequently elevated from the DM-3 to the DM-4 level. The Association and Council do not know whether it is intended that, in the future, other civil servants will be paid at the DM-4 level.

67. In this period of transition, the judiciary is prepared to accept that this Commission compare judicial salaries with the midpoint of the remuneration (including at-risk pay) of DM-3s. However, the Association and Council expressly reserve their right to rely on the DM-4 compensation level as the relevant comparator on appearances before future Quadrennial Commissions.

68. The Drouin Commission quite appropriately rejected the notion, put forward by the Government, that when considering the DM-3 comparator, regard should be had only to the midpoint of the base salary range of DM-3s, without regard to at-risk awards.[34] The Commission chose to consider the average of actual at-risk awards as a percentage of the maximum awards available for DM-3s, an approach that is sound and that reflects the fact that the variable pay component of the remuneration of DM-3s was regarded by the Strong Committee as an integral part of the total compensation for DM-3s.[35] The Association and Council submit that this Commission should adopt this same approach.

34 Drouin Report (2000) at 25-26.

35 Ibid.

69. The Government has provided information to the judiciary concerning the base salary range and at-risk pay for DM-3s from April 1, 1999 to present. The judiciary was also provided with information concerning the percentage of at-risk awards made to DM-3s during the same period. This information is included in Appendix A to these submissions, with an analysis of the remuneration of DM-3s in recent years and a comparison of the remuneration of DM-3s with the salaries of puisne judges during the period 1993 to present.

70. The Association and Council seek a judicial salary for puisne judges as of April 1, 2004 in an amount equal to the current remuneration of deputy ministers at the DM-3 level even though it can be expected that DM-3s will enjoy a further salary increase as of April 1, 2004.

4. Annual increments

71. The Drouin Commission recommended, and the Government accepted in its response to the Drouin Report, that judicial salaries be subject to annual increments over and above statutory indexing.[36] The Association and Council urge this Commission to make a similar recommendation so as to minimize the adjustments to be made to judicial salaries every four years. The Association and Council will make submissions as to the amount of these annual increments at the oral hearing.

5. Salary differentials with justices of the Supreme Court of Canada, Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices

72. For many years the differential between the salaries of puisne judges and those of Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices of the federally appointed judiciary has been relatively constant. The Drouin Commission saw no reason to alter this differential and it is submitted by the Association and Council that it ought to remain unchanged. The same submission is made in respect of the salary differential between superior court judges and puisne judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

73. The Association and Council take no position on the question of whether the Commission should recommend a salary differential between appellate and trial court judges.

EVIDENCE

Chair

Mr. Art Hanger

The commission's report recommended a salary increase of $23,400 per year, retroactive to 2004. The government's position is $15,700 per year, retroactive to 2004. If we adopt one or the other, I don't think we're in danger of the judiciary falling into that temptation.

Mr. Roderick McLennan: Certainly not, and that's not what I've suggested.

The Chair: I wonder if Mr. McLennan would respond to that. I think it's important that he does.

Mr. Roderick McLennan: Yes.

Certainly there's no suggestion that corruption starts around the $220,000-a-year level. At either level, they're not likely to be corrupted. But I'm talking philosophically.

Why does our Constitution establish that Parliament sets the salary of judges? Judges are the third arm of the government and they have to be independent. In order to be independent, they have to have a standard of living that's commensurate with the job they do. And amongst other things, philosophically it prevents them from being subject to corruption. It has nothing to do with whether it's $220,000 or $240,000 or $180,000.

● (1710)

Mr. Rob Moore: Thanks for clarifying that.

Some of what we've heard is that in order to attract candidates, this has to be the amount. I know Mr. Bagnell had some questions on it. I know there's a recognition that the Supreme Court has been pretty clear that it is Parliament that has final authority on the public purse. We are ultimately responsible for how taxpayers' money is spent even in this current system.

When we hear about those who have put their names forward for judicial appointment, the number of vacancies that are available, and the number of applicants who are in there as either recommended or highly recommended, then with the government's proposed increase of 7.25%, I fail to see how someone is somehow being denied the opportunity or is being discouraged from seeking judicial appointment.

I know a great deal of weight was put on the commission's work, and I certainly respect the work the commission has done. But I don't see any evidence that somehow we wouldn't be able to attract highly qualified candidates if the wages that judges are currently paid were increased by 7.25% per year.

Mr. Roderick McLennan: First of all, the statistics that are referred to are statistics from 2000 and are not available to us. But there's no doubt that it has been the case for many years that there are many more applicants for judicial office than there are judicial offices. The question is, what is the appropriate level of compensation, and what do you do to ensure that the best and the brightest are in the pool from which candidates can be selected?

Mr. Rob Moore: Do you see evidence among the current pool of applicants that the best and the brightest are not in that pool? Are people of less than stellar qualifications applying? The individual committees provincially have to recommend or highly recommend these individuals, so do you see evidence that there's any shortage of anyone recommended or highly recommended? When we look at what the committees are putting forward, there seem to be many. The minister testified that there are many who are recommended and highly recommended.

Mr. Roderick McLennan: Of course, the minister's statistics are from 2006. I don't know what they were when this committee was sitting, but we obviously didn't have 2006 numbers.

It's just one of the factors in arriving at a number, but it's not the factor. With respect, if you're hunting for the new president of Canada Post, you don't put the job up for bid and describe its marvellous pension and the corporate jet and ask people to bid for it. If there are 100 qualified people, 25 of whom are really qualified, you don't have a Dutch auction to see what the lowest one is going to work for. You ought not to do that with judges either, in my submission.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Moore.

Ms. Barnes.

Hon. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Thank you very much.

I would apologize for us not being here all the time. The government has chosen to call another piece of legislation at the same time, which necessitates some of us being in the House to speak on it.

I want to first of all put on the record how grateful most Canadians are for the work that you've done and the professional manner in which you have done it for us. I would also like to say that I think it's incredibly important that the concept of the independence of the judiciary is understood by Canadians.

Perhaps this has been canvassed on, but maybe I'll go to Mr. Cherniak to just do a bit of an education process for most Canadians who might be hearing this.

Why should we not be discussing the things we're being forced to discuss at this time?

Mr. Earl Cherniak: Well, the reason is that there was a constitutional process that came about because of the disaster that preceded, which resulted in the P.E.I. reference being necessary in the first place. The constitutional process was to appoint an independent, high-quality commission to work independently, not as an arbitration group but in the public interest, to hear input from the public, from the participants, and to come up with recommendations that, except with very good reason, would be accepted by Parliament to set judicial salaries.

Therein the process mandated not only the method of selecting the commission but the way in which the commission's report was to be addressed by Parliament. The commission had a mandate to report by May 31, 2004—and every fourth year on May 31—which we did. The government had an obligation, under the legislation, to respond in six months, which it did, and either accept the recommendations of the commission or give cogent reasons why it didn't and why the recommendations of the commission should not be accepted.

The government of the day did that, and with one minor exception, which isn't germane to what we're talking about, the government of the day accepted every one of the recommendations we made.

There is no provision in that constitutionally mandated process for what transpired after that. There's no provision for a second report after a new government comes in a year and a half or two years later. In my view, that politicizes the process, and it's extremely dangerous because it causes disrespect for the process among the judiciary, among the public, and it will make it more....

I say, immodestly, this was a very talented commission, and we thought what we were doing was very important to the public of this country. If a future commission's recommendations can be treated in the way that the process has transpired here, there will be a great deal of difficulty finding the kind of commissioners that this country needs to conduct this process every four years.

● (1715)

Hon. Sue Barnes: Thank you very much. So in your opinion there was no legal authority to place before Parliament a second report that differed in nature from the first report. Am I hearing you correctly?

Mr. Earl Cherniak: I don't think I should give a legal opinion. I can read the statute. You can read the statute. There's a provision for the response in six months. That happened. There's no provision for any further response.

Hon. Sue Barnes: Thank you. I think that does answer the concern there.

The Chair: You have time for one more question, Ms. Barnes.

Hon. Sue Barnes: Thank you.

One thing that concerned us at this table is that to increase the numbers, to put this provision back to the original report—as I know some of us would like to do—we need a royal recommendation. Without the royal recommendation of this government, we don't have the authority to spend more money. That puts us in a very difficult position. I just put that on the table so people understand that we can take it down under the rules, but we cannot increase without the government allowing us to do so. We will see how this plays out.

I know my colleague, the former Minister of Justice, wanted to be here, but he's now at another place doing this.

I want to say, at least from my party, and I think from all the opposition parties, with the respect we hold for the judiciary, this attack that seems to be coming from the current government is not only disrespectful, but it is harmful to the whole system of justice in this country. This is a hard-working system of justice. It's led by judicial officers who have been chosen for their talents, as you well know. The fact that we are put in this position today by the current government, I think is wrong. I believe we have sufficient case law on point telling us that.

The Minister of Justice stood in the House, when I responded to it the first time, saying to plead less money in the area, when we had the best surplus ever. To plead that we could get people for cheaper was just a spurious argument. I feel somewhat ashamed to be in this situation at the current time.

I hope that in the future we are able to have people of your calibre doing this work, because it's important for all of us.

If anybody would care to make a comment, I certainly would give my time to them.

● (1720)

The Chair: Thank you, Ms. Barnes.

Would the witnesses like to comment?

Mr. Roderick McLennan: The minister was inviting what would virtually be a free vote, wasn't he? As I understood the minister, I thought he invited the committee to do what they thought was appropriate.

Hon. Sue Barnes: With respect, the minister may have left out the fact that if we want to raise the moneys up, the government has to give its consent, because we don't have that power. That was what I put on the table seconds after he made his statement in the House originally. It's called a royal recommendation.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms. Barnes.

One comment that Ms. Barnes brought up was whether the commission looks at this settlement as an attack on the judiciary.

Mr. Roderick McLennan: I wouldn't say so, Mr. Chair. I don't think it's an attack on the judiciary. The judiciary are much more sensitive about these things than I am, so I don't know what the judiciary would think, but I wouldn't see it that way.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Hon. Sue Barnes: Mr. Chair, I'd like to clarify. I don't think that's what I was saying at all. I was saying that the government is often attacking the discretion of the judiciary, and they do so with their bills, with certain points.

I do not want my words reinterpreted from the chair.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you for the point of clarification, Ms. Barnes.

I would like to thank the witnesses for their appearance.

I think this has been a valuable discussion. It's unfortunate we can't continue on a little longer. I know there are other points the members would like to question further, but time does not permit.

Thank you for your attendance.

I'm going to suspend the meeting for about one minute.

to public servants.[77] As noted by the Crawford Commission, rough parity of this nature between judges and top level public servants finds support in the comparative salary figures from a number of other common law democracies.[78]

96. While making clear that no one comparator should be determinative, the Drouin Commission endorsed the principle of a relationship between judicial salaries and the remuneration of DM-3s. It stated:

> While we agree that the DM-3 comparator should not be determinative of our recommendations concerning judicial salaries, in our view, it is an appropriate and useful comparator at this time. More particularly, we have concluded that the important aspect of the DM-3 comparator, for the purposes of our inquiry, is the maintenance of a relationship between judges' salaries and the remuneration of those senior federal public servants whose skills, experience and levels of responsibilities most closely parallel those of the Judiciary. We agree with the substance of the observation by both the Courtois and Scott Commissions (1990 and 1996) that the relationship between the remuneration of DM-3s and judges should be maintained, not as a precise measure of "value" but as a reflection of "what the marketplace expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by deputy ministers and judges." [79]

97. In the time period between the report of the Drouin Commission in 2000 and the beginning of the mandate of the McLennan Commission in 2003, the Government created a category above the DM-3. The DM-4 category was created as a consequence of a recommendation of the Strong Committee in its third report, dated December 2000.[80] It is interesting to note that one of the factors behind the recommendation of the Strong Committee was the need to "[send] an important message in terms of the government's willingness to attract and retain qualified and experienced staff."[81]

98. At the time of the McLennan Commission, it was understood that there were only two DM-4s, the Clerk of the Privy Council and the Deputy Minister of Finance. The Association and Council have recently been informed by the Government that while there are still only two incumbents in the DM-4 category, the identity of their respective departments is now confidential on the ground that it would identify the particular individuals. The Government has advised that, in general, DM classification is personal to the incumbent and based on merit, and that it is not linked to particular departments.

99. It was explicitly stated before the McLennan Commission that, while the Association and Council reserved the right to use DM-4 as a comparator before subsequent Commissions, the judiciary was willing at that point to forego comparison with the compensation of DM-4s since the category was new and still in a state of flux. There is at present no indication that the DM-4 category will be phased out, and there is no reason to ignore it in the comparison between judicial compensation and the compensation of the most senior deputy ministers.

100. The McLennan Commission expressed some concern about confining the comparison to the DM-3 category,[82] and it also considered information relating to other DM categories. It seemed also to have drawn comparisons with other Governor-in-Council appointees, known as GC and GCQ categories, noting that some of these positions are quasi-judicial in nature.[83]

101. The Association and Council submit that judicial salaries should continue to be compared with the remuneration of the most senior deputy ministers. This comparator has withstood the test of time, and it is one that the Government itself submitted before the Crawford Commission as a formal comparator that should be adopted.[84]

102. To expand the comparative exercise would create the risk of diluting the comparator to a point where there would be no underlying principled logic justifying the comparison. The comparison of judicial salaries with the compensation of the most senior deputy ministers is required on the principled basis that the judiciary is not subordinate to the executive. Members of the judiciary should earn at the same general level as the senior members of the executive since it would otherwise upset the political equilibrium between these two branches of the state.

103. Consideration of the DM-1 is an example of how the comparator risks being diluted if other Governor-in-Council appointees are considered. The Association and Council have been informed by the Government that the DM-1 is normally an Associate Deputy Minister reporting to a DM or to a Deputy Secretary to the Privy Council Office. DM-1s can therefore fairly be described as "DMs in training". It is submitted that any comparison between the judiciary and this category would be bereft of principle.

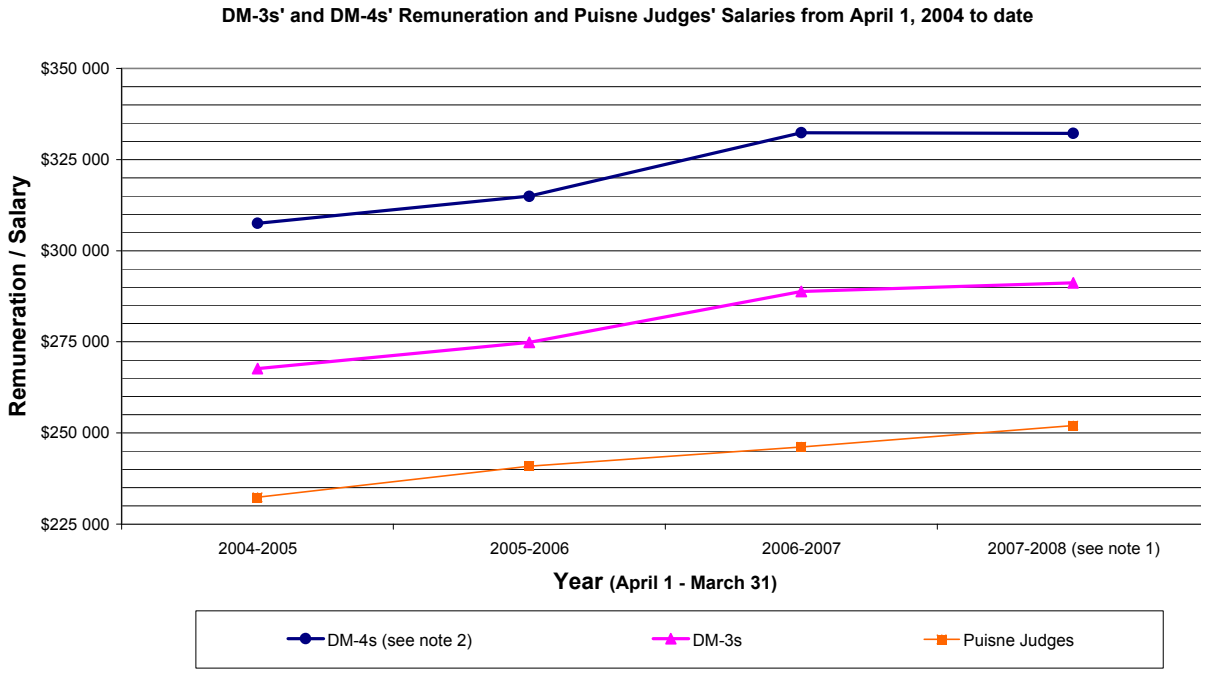
104. As stated above and by many successive compensation commissions, comparison between the remuneration of the most senior deputy ministers and that of judges should continue, not because it is a precise measure of "value", but as a reflection of what the marketplace expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by senior deputy ministers and judges. Just as the senior deputy ministers are outstanding professionals who must execute with excellence heavy responsibilities regarding the conduct of the affairs of the executive branch, judges are appointed because of their outstanding performance as lawyers and because they must impartially and independently adjudicate disputes that have significant ramifications in the public and private spheres.

ii) At-risk pay

105. In recent years, a variable component described as "at-risk pay" has become a significant component of the remuneration of DMs (and certain other Governor-in-Council appointees). That component arose out of the recommendations of the Strong Committee, which said the following about "at-risk" pay for deputy ministers:

> […]we are proposing a compensation system where the job rate, the fixed component of compensation that is paid for fully satisfactory performance, is adjusted at intervals using market comparisons of total compensation in appropriate comparator groups. The proposed compensation system would have no overtime payments or automatic annual increments. It would, however, include a considerable amount of pay "at risk"—a variable component of compensation that is tied to

120. Since April 1, 2004, the salary of puisne judges and the average compensation of DM-3s and DM-4s have evolved as set out in the graph below (and also in Appendix G).



Note 1
The "at risk" portion of the 2007-2008 DM-3 salary is currently unavailable and has been projected based on the immediately preceding 3-year average calculated as a percentage of average base salary, being 11.7%.

Note 2
The average salary and the "at risk" portion of the DM-4s' salaries are not made available due to confidentialityconcerns. Accordingly, the total average compensation of the DM-4s, including the "at risk" portion, has been estimated for each annual period based on the assumption that the DM-4 incumbents received average salaries and average "at risk" paythat bear the same relation to the DM-3s' average pay to mid-point salary and average "at risk" pay to maximum at risk pay, respectively.

121. As illustrated in Appendix G and above, the gap between judicial remuneration and that of the most senior deputy ministers is persisting. The longer this situation is allowed to persist, the more difficult it will be to narrow the gap. Yet, there is no comparator that embodies the democratic principle of equilibrium between the branches of the state the way this comparator does.

b) Private-sector lawyers' income

i) Introduction

122. The incomes of private practitioners have been considered by all judicial compensation commissions as an important comparator in the setting of adequate judicial salaries. As noted earlier in these submissions, this comparator has particular relevance in view of the third criterion provided in subsection 26(1.1) of the Judges Act, namely, "the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary".

123. Lawyers in private practice have long been the primary source of candidates to the Bench. The Drouin Commission noted that in the years 1990 to 1999, 73% of those appointed to the Bench came from the private Bar, a proportion that increases to 82% if judges elevated from the provincial or territorial Bench are excluded from the calculation.[96] As the McLennan Commission reported in May 2004, based on information from the Judicial Appointments Secretariat, approximately 73% (268/368) of appointees during the period from January 1, 1997 to March 30, 2004 came from private practice.[97] For the period April 1, 2004 to March 31, 2007, a majority of 78% (110/141) continued to be appointed from the private sector. This proportion increases to 84% (110/131) if judges elevated from the provincial Bench and masters are excluded.[98] In short, it has been and will continue to be the case that the overwhelming majority of judges come from the private Bar.

124. Among the judges appointed between April 1, 2004 and March 31, 2007, 61.7% came from the ten largest urban centres.[99] In order to ensure that outstanding candidates from 99 The following are the 10 largest Census Metropolitan Areas, according to the 2006 census: Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Ottawa-Gatineau, Calgary, Edmonton, Quebec City, Winnipeg, Hamilton, and London. the private Bar will continue to seek judicial appointments, judicial salaries must be fixed taking into account the higher level of earnings that such practitioners enjoy as well as the higher cost of living that prevails in such centres.

125. The McLennan Commission found that the income of self-employed lawyers in the larger Canadian cities exceeded the current level of judicial compensation, even when the value of the judicial annuity is factored in.[100] Observing that many appointees come from higher-income brackets, the McLennan Commission expressed the view that it is important "to establish a salary level that does not discourage members of that group from considering judicial office."[101]

126. The Judges Act speaks of the need to attract "outstanding" candidates to the judiciary. Accordingly, it has long been acknowledged that what matters is not to count the numbers of applications for appointment but, rather, to create conditions that will encourage applications from outstanding candidates. While there are no doubt exceptions, the income derived from private practice by lawyers whom one would categorize as "outstanding" will almost always exceed the judicial salary. The Association and Council submit that Quadrennial Commissions must be forward-looking in establishing judicial salaries so as to ensure that outstanding candidates will be willing to seek judicial appointment throughout the four-year period covered by a Commission's salary recommendations.

127. Income is of course not the only measure of the quality of candidates from the Bar. It is also clear that the judicial annuity is a substantial benefit to judges which is not enjoyed by private practitioners. In addition, as the Lang Commission noted some twenty-four years ago, there is real value to be placed upon the opportunity for public service which is offered to members of the judiciary.[102] Nevertheless, judicial compensation, including

Counsel for the Government of Canada

46. The Government considers this novel, indeed unprecedented, assertion to be not only wrong in law by irrelevant to the Quadrennial Commission exercise. To the degree that senior public servants are relied on as comparators, the analysis is about relative capacity and quality. It has nothing to do with the relationship between the Executive – that is the Prime Minister and his Cabinet - and the judiciary.

47. Moreover the implications of this assertion for the other branch of government, Parliament, must also be considered. Would the judiciary also assert that its compensation must maintain an "equilibrium" with Parliamentarians? That equilibrium would currently be retained by limiting judicial salary increases to annual statutory indexing, which is what Parliamentarians, including Ministers of the Crown, currently receive.[25] The Government submits that introducing this irrelevant consideration simply muddies the waters and diverts the Commission from its primary focus on adequacy in light of the statutory criteria.

[25] As explained in the Government's Opening Submission at paragraph 14, all judicial salaries are indexed automatically pursuant to s. 25 of the Judges Act. Judicial salaries are increased by the percentage change in the Industrial Aggregate from one year to the next year. Parliamentarians' salaries, on the other hand, are indexed automatically by reference to another index:

> The index…for a calendar year is the index of the average percentage increase in base-rate wages for the calendar year, resulting from major settlements negotiated with bargaining units of 500 or more employees in the private sector in Canada, as published by the Department of Human Resources and Skills Development within three months after the end of that calendar year.

Parliament of Canada Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. P-1, as amended, s. 67.1; Salaries Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-3, as am., s. 4.2. See Reply Appendices, Appendix 11.

ii. Midpoint of the DM Salary Range

48. In addition to rejecting the proposed focus on DM3-4 as the exclusive public sector comparator, the Government does not accept the judiciary's assertion that it would be "more accurate" to reply upon the average salary, as opposed to the midpoint of the DM salary range. The average salary figure will fluctuate depending upon the seniority of the complement. This is significant, particularly where the pool is relatively small.[26]

49. For example, when the DM-3 complement is composed of officials with long standing experience, the average salary will tend to be higher because all the individuals have progressed well through the salary range. The addition of just one new appointee to the complement with a salary at the lower end of salary band will lower the average salary of the whole DM-3 complement. Thus, it preferable to use the midpoint of the salary range because it provides a comparison point that does not shift depending on composition of DM complement.

50. The Government made reference to the salary midpoint in its submissions concerning the range of senior level executives who are suitable comparators for the judiciary.[27] The Government submits that reference to the midpoint of the salary range maintains the objectivity of the public sector comparator.

[26] In 2006-07 there 10 DM-3s and 2 DM-4s. See Submission of the Government of Canada Appendices, Vol. II., Appendix 13.
[27] Government's Opening Submission, p. 19, para. 50.

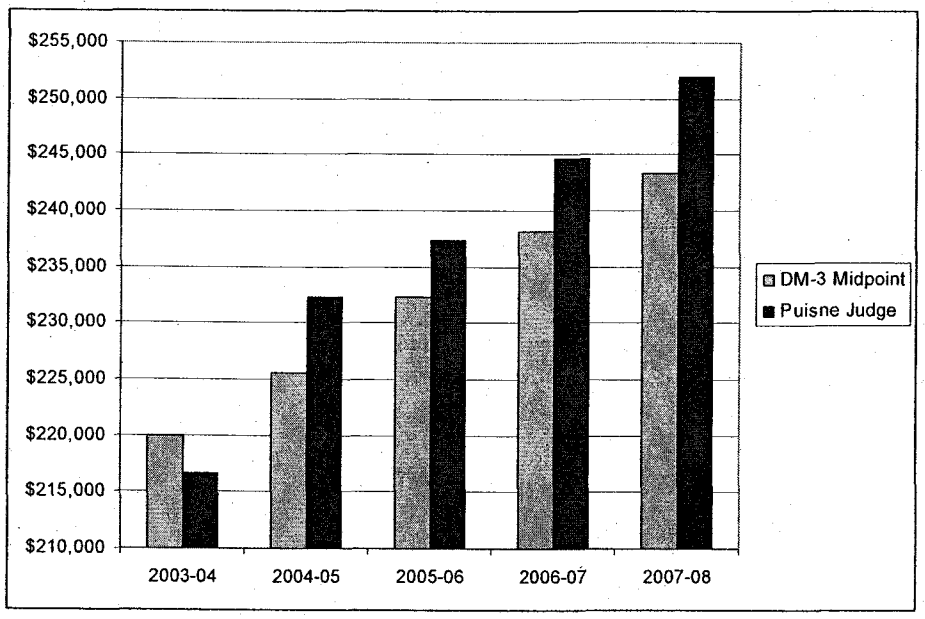
51. It should also be noted that the graph at paragraph 119 and Appendix F of the Joint Submission purports to illustrate DM-3 midpoint salaries. In fact this graph actually demonstrates DM-3 midpoint salaries plus estimated average at-risk pay awards.

52. And finally, the statement in the Joint Submission that there is an increasing disparity between the salary of puisne judges and the midpoint of the DM-3 salary range is not correct. As the graph below illustrates, the judicial salary actually surpasses the DM-3 midpoint ($252,000 vs. $243,300).



iii. At-risk Pay

53. The Government once again rejects the judiciary's claim to entitlement to the equivalent of at-risk pay for senior public servants. At-risk pay is an amount that senior public servants, including lawyers, "re-earn" in each year based on the

THE CRA PRE-APPOINTMENT INCOME DATA OF JUDGES

February 12, 2008

PREFACE

1. The present Supplemental Reply Submission of the Association and Council relates to data collected by the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA"), at the request of the Department of Justice, regarding the pre-appointment income of judges appointed between 1995 and 2007 (the "pre-appointment income data" or "PAI data").

2. The Government agreed to redact the portions of its principal Reply Submissions dealing with the pre-appointment income data so as to give the Association and Council an opportunity to address the issue before either party's submissions in respect of this question would be released to the Commission and the public, including the members of the federal judiciary whose income had been inquired into by the Government. The unredacted version of the Reply Submissions of the Government was released only to the Association and Council pending the present Supplemental Reply Submission.

3. It was agreed between the principal parties that the unredacted version of the Reply Submission of the Government and the Supplemental Reply Submission of the Association and Council relating to the pre-appointment income data would be filed simultaneously on February 12, 2008. The Association and Council consented to the Government having the option of filing a rejoinder to the present Supplemental Reply Submission by February 19, 2008.

OVERVIEW

4. The Association and Council have serious concerns about the manner in which the Government has proceeded in obtaining the pre-appointment income data, and the appropriateness of gathering such data.

5. The Association and Council also submit that serious due process concerns arise from the Government's reliance on this data in view of the judiciary's inability, because of the need to preserve confidentiality, to test the validity of the underlying raw data.

6. In addition to these concerns, the following significant methodological and other problems are readily apparent and undermine the reliability and relevance of the data:

- significant variations in the year-to-year income of certain lawyers prior to appointment;
- unlikely low income levels for certain lawyers prior to appointment;
- conflation of different kinds of income inquiries;
- width of the pre-appointment income window of five years; and
- limitations of median values for pre-appointment information broken down by year.

These problems are discussed further below.

7. Even if it were assumed that the pre-appointment income data is reliable, which it is not, it would be of very limited relevance to the Commission. This is so because the pre-appointment data relates not to the income level of eligible candidates for appointment to the Bench in the four years of the Commission's mandate, but to the income level of lawyers appointed during the mandates of previous Commissions, going back to 1990.

I. DESCRIPTION OF THE PAI DATA

8. The Navigant Report on the Canada Revenue Agency's Pre-Appointment Income Data (the "Navigant PAI Report"), in paragraphs 2 to 13, contains a description of the PAI Data which it is useful to reproduce herein.

CRA provided three sets of data:

a) the original PAI data consisting of the ratio of the five-year income average to the salary earned as a judge for around 90% of the lawyers who were appointed as judges between 1995 and 2007;

b) an amended PAI data set (the original PAI data set was amended because CRA found that it had applied a defective methodology to calculate the net-present-value adjustment); and

c) data concerning the year-to-year income variations over the five-year period for each lawyer.

The CRA amended PAI data set and the data concerning the year-to-year income variations over the five-year period for each lawyer are reproduced, respectively, in Appendices A and B to the Navigant PAI Report.

9. The Government gave to CRA a list of 627 judges who were appointed after 1994. CRA was able to match 567 of those judges (around 90%) with tax filings in its records and it proceeded to collect and report upon their pre-appointment income based on their tax returns.

10. The PAI data is broken down into two employment categories: employed and self-employed. This categorization is based on the employment status of the lawyer in the year prior to appointment. Therefore, if, in the previous four years, there was a change in status from employed to self-employed, or vice versa, this change would not be reflected in the data.

11. Appendix A to the Navigant PAI Report contains the ratio for each judge, the median ratio (as calculated by CRA) for appointees in each year between 1995 and 2007, technical notes provided by CRA in respect of the ratios, and the methodology used by CRA to generate the data. It should be noted that the ratio represents the proportion of the five-year average to the judicial salary one year after appointment. For example, a ratio of 100% means that the lawyer had a five-year pre-appointment average income that was 100% of what he/she went on to make as a judge in the first year after appointment.

12. It is important to understand that there are two steps that lead to the calculation of the ratio about which the parties have no information. The first step is identifying the actual dollar values for each of the five years that served to generate the five-year average. Disclosure of these values was refused due to confidentiality concerns. The second step is arriving at the dollar-value five-year average. This dollar-value average for each of the lawyers was also withheld because of confidentiality concerns. What is available is only the third step: the ratio of that average to the first-year salary earned as a judge.

13. The ratio for each judge is not correlated to the year of appointment. The only information given based on years of appointment is the median ratio. The median ratio is the ratio of the individual judge whose ratio falls in the middle of the range of ratios for all appointees for the given year of appointment. Half of the ratios in that range are less than the median and half are more.

14. As explained by Navigant, a median value gives no sense of the kind of values that come before and after it. A far better measure than a median ratio would be an average ratio. CRA refused disclosure of that information on the basis that providing average ratios for each year would compromise anonymity.

15. Appendix B contains the percentage year-to-year income variations for each lawyer prior to appointment over the five-year period. While indicative of income variations over the five-year period, the percentages are still far removed from the actual annual income figures for the lawyers in question.

II. NON-DISCLOSURE AND INAPPROPRIATENESS

16. The Association and Council were first informed by the Government about the existence of the PAI data on November 21, 2007, less than one month before the filing deadline of December 14, 2007 for first-round submissions. The judiciary was never consulted about the proposed methodology to be applied by CRA. When concerns were raised in this regard, the judiciary was told – on two occasions – that the Government had only approached CRA about the possibility of collecting this information after June 8, 2007. Upon further inquiry by the judiciary, the Association and Council learned that the request to gather pre-appointment income data was made at a high-level meeting between CRA and representatives of the Department of Justice on March 7, 2007.

17. The Association and Council submit that the Commission should decline to consider the PAI data on the basis that the Government ought to have disclosed to the judiciary that it would be seeking to collect this data for use before the Commission, so as to give the judiciary an opportunity to comment on the proposed data collection and the methodology applied by CRA.

18. The judiciary also submits that it is inappropriate for the Government to collect and rely upon pre-appointment income data of sitting judges obtained from CRA without their consent in the context of the Quadrennial Commission process. The data relates to a small identifiable group of sitting judges. It is derived from individual tax returns, filed with an expectation of privacy, which reflect the personal financial affairs of the individuals in question.

III. DEFECTS UNDERMINING THE DATA

A. RELIABILITY

1. No access to underlying data

19. Due to confidentiality concerns, CRA refused to disclose the underlying PAI data to the judiciary or its experts. As a consequence, the data could not be tested directly for reliability or validity. For example, it is not possible, without the underlying raw data, to determine whether the income data sought to be captured is actually captured in the data provided, or whether extraneous elements unwittingly affect the data.

20. The data provided by CRA does not allow a correlation to be made between lawyers and their geographic provenance, gender, or age. Such correlation would greatly assist in analyzing and testing the data.

21. As pointed out in their PAI Report, Navigant would have needed to review and analyze the underlying data to test its validity and reliability.[1]

22. Accordingly, since the judiciary is prevented from comprehensively testing the underlying data provided by CRA, its use by the Government in the Commission process raises serious due process concerns.

[1] Navigant PAI Report at paras. 5, 14.

2. Significant variations in annual income within the five-year period

23. As noted above, CRA has produced, at the request of the judiciary, a table indicating the percentage year-to-year income variations for each lawyer prior to appointment over the five-year period.[2] Based on that information, Navigant has produced a table, reproduced in Appendix D of the PAI Report, setting out the percentage variance of the annual percentage changes in pre-appointment income for each lawyer over the five-year period prior to appointment.[3]

24. According to Navigant, the significant percentage variations in annual income within the five-year period prior to appointment for certain lawyers suggest some kind of problem in the data. Whatever the cause of the problem, it seems that those lawyers' actual income has not been captured.

25. In addition, there are two noticeable, and sometimes contradictory, trends in the income of certain lawyers who were appointed to the Bench: significant increases or decreases from year to year and consistent losses over the period in question.

26. For example, 75 of the 389 (19%) self-employed lawyers had an average negative income growth over the five-year period prior to appointment. Similarly, 25 of the 178 (14%) employed lawyers had an average negative income growth.[4] This is at odds with what is generally known about income change with increased seniority at the bar, whether in the employed or self-employed category.

27. Some of the negative income trends need to be explicitly depicted in order to understand fully the oddity of the data. One lawyer had a 10% increase at the outset of the five-year period, but then proceeded to suffer a 69.7% drop in income, followed by a further

[3] Navigant PAI Report, Appendix D.

[4] Navigant PAI Report at para. 21.

154.5% drop, and then a colossal 728.4% drop in the year prior to appointment.[5] This defies logic.

28. A more extreme example is that of a lawyer who posted a 16.4% loss at the outset of the five-year period, then lost another 8.2%, then lost 448.1%, and finally, lost 625.7% in the year prior to appointment.[6] Seemingly, this lawyer consistently lost income over the five years prior to appointment. The Commission should not use this kind of data to make recommendations as to adequate compensation.

3. Improbable income levels for self-employed lawyers

29. Putting aside trends for individual lawyers over the five-year period, it strains credibility that the data presented for certain lawyers is actually representative of their income. For example, one self-employed lawyer had a five-year pre-appointment average income of approximately 10% of the judicial salary.[7] If one assumes that the judicial salary of this lawyer was the 2006 level of $244,700, it means that the average pre-appointment income of this lawyer was approximately $24,470, and this in the private sector. This is either incorrect or reflects extraordinary factors that this data fails to take into account such as income splitting, maternity leaves, sabbaticals or the like.

30. The CRA data does not allow verification of the impact of these factors, even though they are known to be present. To take one example: the use of management companies of which a practising lawyer's spouse, a personal corporation or a family trust is the shareholder has been prevalent in the legal profession as an income-splitting method throughout the period covered by the PAI data.[8] As confirmed by Deloitte, as much as $60,000 of a self-employed lawyer's income can be directed to the lawyer's family members using this method. CRA's PAI data does not capture that income even though it is generated by the lawyer's practice, since it is paid to the lawyer's family members.

31. It will be noted that when the Government states that "19% of all appointees were earning less than half of a judicial salary,"[9] included in that figure is an appointee who had an average income of approximately 10% of judicial salary. The Commission must ask itself whether this makes any sense in the context of determining adequate compensation for the judiciary.

4. Conflation of different kinds of income inquiries

32. The Government relies on the figure of 19% of all appointees earning less than half of a judicial salary to conclude that this > displaces the methodological assumption used by past Commissions and still advanced by the judiciary that no one who earns less than $60K [sic] per annum would apply for or be considered qualified to be appointed a judge.[10]

33. Putting aside the improbability that any appointee actually practising earned less than $60,000, and the probability that figures like the 10% ratio are defective or simply unreflective of actual income, the Government neglects one critical fact. When the Government states that 19% of all appointees were earning less than half of a judicial salary, this includes both employed and self-employed lawyers. Yet, the $60,000 exclusion has only been applied to self-employed lawyers.

34. The Government's comment, however, is indicative of a more profound misconception about the distinction between various kinds of inquiries to be made in determining adequate compensation. The application of first principles dictates that appointees to the Bench should continue to come largely from the ranks of self-employed lawyers. To the extent that a certain diversity of the makeup of the Bench is required, employed lawyers must also be appointed. Of necessity, the parameters to be applied to delineate an appropriate comparator will be different when dealing with employed lawyers since the scale of compensation for these lawyers is generally lower compared to self-employed lawyers.

35. However, for the Government to use the fact of the lower pay scale in the employed category as a justification for including those who earn less than $60,000 in the self-employed category is an example of the proverbial mistake of comparing apples and oranges.

5. Pre-appointment window is too wide

36. Another methodological problem noted by Navigant is that the five-year period prior to appointment is too wide.[11] It is really the last year prior to the year of appointment, perhaps in tandem with the year of appointment, that would be determinative in a lawyer's decision to accept an appointment to the Bench. Common sense suggests that only in rare circumstances would one consider what one earned five years ago in order to decide whether to accept an appointment to the Bench.

37. Moreover, according to Navigant a five-year window is more likely to capture outlier years like maternity leaves, personal leaves, sabbaticals, secondments, etc.[12], none of which is taken into account in the Government's methodology. Any of these would obviously bring about a distortion in the data.

6. Limitations of median values

38. For each year of appointments, CRA has only given the median ratio, to the exclusion of the average ratio for that year. The median is simply the mid-point in a range of values from highest to lowest. The values before the median are lower than the median and the values after the median are higher. However, as Navigant points out, a median can easily be the watershed before a spike in the income levels. In other words, the ratios might rise significantly after the median value. The fact that values after the median are higher does not reveal the magnitude of those values. There is no way of knowing if the ratios after the median are significantly higher than the median when all that is available is the median value. CRA withheld average values out of concern for confidentiality.

[11] Navigant PAI Report at paras. 15-16.

[12] Navigant PAI Report at para.15.

7. Conclusion as to reliability

39. By reason of the foregoing, and of the Navigant PAI Report, the Association and Council submit that the PAI data is uninformative, should not be relied upon by the Commission or, alternatively, that it should not be given much weight.

B. RELEVANCE

40. Assuming that reliable PAI data could be generated by a survey or through CRA data (provided that the latter would take account of the impact of income splitting, maternity leaves and other such factors), such PAI data would nonetheless be of little value to the Commission. The reason is that the PAI data relates not to the income level of eligible candidates for appointment to the Bench in the four years of the Commission's mandate, but rather to the income level of lawyers appointed during the mandates of previous commissions. To illustrate the point, the PAI data contains five-year pre-appointment income data of lawyers appointed in 1995, hence of income dating back to 1990.

41. The purpose of the Government in relying on the PAI data is unclear. On the one hand, it asserts that compensation "is not the only, or even the predominant, attraction of judicial office".[13] On the other hand, it highlights from the PAI data that 62% of appointees among self-employed lawyers received a "significant increase" in income upon appointment.[14] If the Government's figure of 62% is to be relied upon, which it should not, the inference to be drawn would be that judicial salaries are an incentive to attracting judges who enjoyed low pre-appointment incomes and that compensation does play a salient role in attracting candidates to judicial office.

[14] Reply Submission of the Government of Canada at para. 21, first bullet.

42. If the intention of the Government is to influence the Commission's determination of an adequate salary level for 2008-2011, which is the period under consideration, the PAI data is not relevant. The PAI data cannot function as a comparator. It has neither the detail and currency of the Navigant survey or that of the 2005 CRA data on the income levels of self-employed lawyers, nor does it have the normative character of the comparison with the most senior DMs.

The whole respectfully submitted.

Comparison of DM-3s salaries with "at risk" pay

139. As can be seen in this graph, the salary recommendation of the Block Commission, had it been implemented, would have effectively closed the gap between judicial salaries and the DM-3 comparator, as calculated by the Block Commission, even though judicial salaries would have remained well below the average compensation actually received by DM-3s.

140. The Block Commission considered the issue of the DM-3 comparator to be settled. It should no longer be necessary to explain why the comparison with the DM-3s is a principled one and why the comparison is of central importance. The present Commission should rely on the rationale that led the Block Commission to make its salary recommendation as support for its endorsement of this recommendation.

ii) Self-employed lawyers' income

- Introduction

141. The incomes of private practitioners have been considered by all judicial compensation commissions as an important comparator in the setting of adequate judicial salaries. As noted earlier in these submissions, this comparator has particular relevance in view of the third criterion provided in subsection 26(1.1) of the Judges Act, namely, "the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary".

142. Lawyers in private practice have long been the primary source of candidates to the Bench. The Drouin Commission noted that in the years 1990 to 1999, 73% of those appointed to the Bench came from the private Bar, a proportion that increases to 82% if judges elevated from the provincial or territorial Bench are excluded from the calculation.[102] As the McLennan Commission reported in May 2004, based on information from the Judicial Appointments Secretariat of the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs ("OCFJA"), approximately 73% of appointees during the period from January 1, 1997 to March 30, 2004 came from private practice.[103] For the period April 1, 2004 to March 31, 2007, the period at issue before the Block Commission, a majority of around 78% continued to be appointed from private practice. This proportion increases to 84% if judges elevated from the provincial/territorial Bench and masters are excluded from the pool.[104]

143. Based on the data provided for the period of April 1, 2007 to March 31, 2011 by the OCFJA, around 70% of appointees came from private practice during that period,[105] 80% if judges elevated from the provincial/territorial Bench, masters, and members of administrative tribunals are excluded from the pool.[106] As can be seen, judges have been,

[105] One appointee was an in-house counsel in the private sector and therefore strictly speaking would not fall within the category of private practice. Another in-house counsel was classified as being in the public sector since that appointee was an in-house lawyer at a Crown corporation..

[106] For the 2007-2011 period, there were 23 provincial/territorial judges, 2 masters, and 3 members of administrative tribunals appointed.

and should continue to be, appointed in the main from the private practice of law in Canada.[107]

144. Among the judges appointed between April 1, 2004 and March 31, 2007, 67% came from the ten largest urban centres,[108] and among those appointed between April 1, 2007 and March 31, 2011, 60% came from the ten largest urban centres.[109] In order to ensure that outstanding candidates from the private Bar will continue to seek judicial appointments, judicial salaries must be fixed taking into account the higher level of earnings that such practitioners enjoy as well as the higher cost of living that prevails in such centres.

145. The McLennan Commission found that the income of self-employed lawyers in the larger Canadian cities exceeded the current level of judicial compensation, even when the value of the judicial annuity is factored in.[110] Observing that many appointees come from higher-income brackets, the McLennan Commission expressed the view that it is important "to establish a salary level that does not discourage members of that group from considering judicial office."[111]

146. The Judges Act speaks of the need to attract "outstanding" candidates to the judiciary. Accordingly, it has long been acknowledged that what matters is not to count the numbers of applications for appointment but, rather, to create conditions that will encourage applications from outstanding candidates. The Association and Council

[107] The Block Commission took note of the shift in the provenance of American appointees when judicial salaries were allowed to lag behind lawyer compensation in the private sector. The majority of appointees in the U.S. now comes from the public sector even though in the 1950s a majority came from the private sector (Block Report at paras 71-72); see also American College of Trial Lawyers, "Judicial Compensation: Our Federal Judges Must Be Fairly Paid", March 2007, at 1. submit that Quadrennial Commissions must be forward-looking in establishing judicial salaries so as to ensure that outstanding candidates will be willing to seek judicial appointment throughout the four-year period covered by a Commission's salary recommendations.

147. Income is of course not the only measure of the quality of candidates from the Bar. It is also clear that the judicial annuity is a substantial benefit to judges which is not enjoyed by private practitioners. In addition, as the Lang Commission noted some twenty-four years ago, there is real value to be placed upon the opportunity for public service which is offered to members of the judiciary.[112] Nevertheless, judicial compensation, including judicial annuities, remains a factor of significant importance in the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary.

148. In sum, the income level of senior lawyers in the private practice of law in Canada should continue to serve as a comparator by this Commission, and judicial salaries must be at a level sufficient to ensure that outstanding practitioners will continue to be prepared to consider judicial appointment.

- The 2006-2010 CRA data

149. As in the past, the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") was mandated by the Government and the judiciary to assemble a database consisting of the 2006 to 2010 tax returns of self-employed individuals who identified themselves as lawyers on forms T2032, "Statement of Professional Activities", or T2124, "Statement of Business Activities".[113] This database was then used to generate statistics based on specific parameters.

150. CRA was asked by the Association and Council to produce data of net professional income of all self-employed lawyers in Canada for the years 2006 to 2010, according to a perception that judges were not shouldering their share of the burden in difficult economic times."[9]

6. The global economy has recently experienced the deepest and most synchronized recession since the Great Depression. That recession has had a seriously detrimental effect on Canada's finances. Global recovery from the recession has been slow. Recently, the global economic situation has deteriorated, particularly as a result of the sovereign debt and banking crisis in Europe and concerns over the sustainability of the U.S. fiscal situation.

7. In 2009, the Government exempted judges from wage restraint measures that were applied generally to the public sector due to the recession. However, the effects of the recession have been deeper and more protracted than expected at that time. The Government is of the view that continued exemption of the judiciary from the fiscal measures applying to others who are paid from the public purse is not sustainable or fair, and would be inconsistent with the guidance provided in the PEI Judges Reference.

8. Accordingly, to maintain public confidence in the judiciary and ensure that increases in judicial salaries reflect the constraint on public sector spending, the Government proposes that salary increases as a result of statutory indexation in s. 25 of the Judges Act be capped at a maximum of 1.5% annually for the quadrennial period.[10] The Government notes that the adequacy of the resulting salary will be reviewed again by the 2015 Quadrennial Commission.

[9] Ibid. at para. 196.

[10] Indexation under the Judges Act is based on the "Industrial Aggregate" index ("IAI") published by Statistics Canada: Judges Act, s. 25. The IAI is the percentage change in average weekly earnings ("AWE") across all industries, including overtime, as calculated by Statistics Canada on the basis of monthly labour income surveys of employers. IAI is applied to judicial salaries on a fiscal-year basis, so it is the change in AWE over the most recently available 12-month period, which is the previous calendar year. That is, the IAI increase applied on April 1, 2012 will be the increase in the AWE over the course of 2011.

The IAI projections of Canada's Chief Actuary that would be applied to judicial salaries for 2012-16 are 2.2%; 2.6%; 2.8% and 2.9% respectively: Letter from M. Mercier, Office of the Chief Actuary, Office of the Superintendant of Financial Institutions, dated December 8, 2011 (to be included in the Joint Book of Documents to be submitted by the parties).

The most recent projections of IAI by the Department of Finance are 2.4% for 2011 (applied to judges in 2012) and 1.3% for 2012 (applied to judges in 2013): Letter from B. Robidoux, Assistant Deputy Minister, Economic and Fiscal Policy Branch, Department of Finance, dated December 16, 2011 ("Department of Finance Letter"), Annex D to this submission.

they would be with IAI adjustments alone. This would leave judicial salaries at $23,517, or 6.1%, less than the projected total average compensation of DM-3s by the end of the current quadrennial cycle.

Comparison of Judicial Salary with proposed increases and Total Average Compensation, 2015-2019 (Projected)

Date	Judicial Salary	Total Average Compensation	Difference between Judicial Salary and Total Average Compensation
			Percentage	$
April 1, 2015	$308,600	$356,538	-13.4%	-$47,938
April 1, 2016	$320,300	$363,312	-11.8%	-$43,012
April 1, 2017	$333,700	$370,215	-9.9%	-$36,515
April 1, 2018	$346,700	$377,249	-8.1%	-$30,549
April 1, 2019	$360,900	$384,417	-6.1%	-$23,517

112. The above projections assume that the statutory indexation based on IAI as provided for in s. 25 of the Judges Act will remain unchanged through the present quadrennial cycle. The IAI adjustment in the Judges Act is, along with the judicial annuity, one of the cornerstones of judicial financial security and an integral part of the "social contract"[57] that the Government and lawyers appointed to the Bench have entered into. In view of the constant risk of the politicization of the setting of judicial compensation, IAI adjustments have long been recognized as an essential tool to preserve judicial independence through financial security for the judiciary.

113. Before the Levitt Commission, the Government submitted that the annual IAI adjustments should be capped at 1.5% (a percentage below the expected IAI figures for that quadrennial cycle). The Levitt Commission rejected the Government's submission as inconsistent with the history and purpose of the IAI adjustment:

> The Government submissions characterized the IAI Adjustment as inflation protection without making any mention of its legislative history. In light of this history, the Drouin Commission made it clear that the IAI "is intended to, and in many years does, encompass more than changes in > the cost of living as reflected in the consumer price index". In the Commission's view the legislative history indicates that the IAI Adjustment was intended to be a key element in the architecture of the legislative scheme for fixing judicial remuneration without compromising the independence of the judiciary and, as such, should not lightly be tampered with.[58]

114. Despite the Levitt Commission's urging that the IAI adjustment "should not lightly be tampered with", the Government has now advised that it intends to ask the Commission to recommend that the statutory indexation in the Judges Act be changed from IAI to the Consumer Price Index ("CPI"). The Association and the Council are surprised by this position and will submit that changing the statutory indexation in the Judges Act to the CPI would be inconsistent with the history and purpose of the IAI adjustment. The Association and the Council reserve their right to respond to any such proposal in their Reply Submission.

ii) Self-employed lawyers' income

115. The incomes of self-employed private practitioners have been considered by nearly all judicial compensation commissions as an important comparator in the setting of adequate judicial salaries. This comparator has particular relevance in view of the third criterion provided in s. 26(1.1) of the Judges Act, namely, "the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary", since lawyers in private practice have long been the primary source of candidates to the Bench.[59]

116. As in the past, the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") was mandated by the Government and the judiciary to assemble a database consisting of the 2010 to 2014 tax returns of individuals identified by CRA as self-employed lawyers. This database was then used to generate statistics based on specific parameters.

117. The table below shows the relevant data for the 44-56 age group (52 remains the average age of appointment[60]), at the 75th percentile, with a low-income exclusion of 59 Between 2011 and 2015, 36% of the 226 judicial appointees were from the public sector, which includes government, academia, legal aid clinics, in-house counsel for corporations or other organizations and provincial courts, based on data compiled from information provided by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs to the principal parties for 2007 to 2011, and 2011 to 2015 [JBD at tab 5].

$60,000, for Canada as a whole and the top 10 CMAs, where the majority of judges reside. The table compares this data with the salary of puisne judges:

2012	$365,305	$457,880	$288,100	-21.1%	-37.1%
2013	$364,340	$437,055	$295,500	-18.9%	-32.4%
2014	$373,290	$454,915	$300,800	-19.4%	-33.9%

118. The parameters set out in this table, namely 44-56 age band, 75th percentile, low-income exclusion, top 10 CMAs, have all been endorsed by previous Commissions.[61]

119. The rationale behind the low-income exclusion is that lawyers in private practice who earn below a certain threshold are not suitable candidates for the judiciary since that low income reflects a lack of success or time commitment that is incommensurate with the demands of a judicial appointment.[62]

120. While the amount of $60,000 has been the traditional low-income cut-off since 2000, it appears that after fifteen years, an adjustment for inflation is now required. The Association and the Council are advised that it would be appropriate that this figure be adjusted to $80,000, to account for inflation since the year 2000, the year in the data when the level of $60,000 was first applied.

101. While the Government does refer to two studies that were commissioned in the United Kingdom in 2005 and 2010 as studies that are similar to the proposed quality-of-life study, neither of these studies involved a comprehensive examination of the non-monetary aspects of judicial life. The researchers in the 2005 and 2010 studies (found at tabs 47 and 48 of the Government's Book of Documents) simply asked judges what the main reasons were that had led them to taking up a judicial post, and barristers and advocates the main reasons why they would or would not consider taking up a judicial post. Both surveys included salary considerations.

102. The Association and the Council question whether there is any value to a quality-of-life study, or whether it would produce any useful information.

103. To the extent the Government is proposing something other than what was done in the United Kingdom in 2005 and 2010, it is not clear that a survey into judges' current view on the non-monetary aspects of their position is relevant to the Commission's inquiry into the adequacy of judicial salaries. This Commission is not tasked with inquiring into the judicial quality of life, but rather inquiring into salary and benefits that will guarantee judicial independence and continue to attract outstanding candidates. The Government needs to explain how the proposed quality-of-life study would provide the Commission with reliable and useful data that would assist it to fulfil its mandate.

104. Ms. Haydon characterizes such a study as "unheard of", and observes:

> Quality of life is a highly personal experience, and as the Government notes, intangible, and as such should not be a consideration in compensation determination.[91]

G. Methodological issue in the CRA self-employed lawyers data

105. One of the tables that CRA provided to the parties in advance of the Commission process shows the net professional income of self-employed lawyers in all of Canada split into 20 percentile rows (from 5% to 100%).

106. In the tables that CRA produced during previous quadrennial cycles, the income shown on any specific percentile row showed the actual percentile income. That is, the income on the x^{th} percentile row showed the x^{th} percentile income. CRA changed the way it presented the data in the tables it provided for this quadrennial cycle in response to new confidentiality standards. Whereas the x^{th} percentile row previously showed the actual x^{th} percentile income (i.e. the 75^{th} percentile row showed the actual 75^{th} percentile income), the x^{th} percentile row now shows the mean of the incomes falling between the $(x-5)^{th}$ and the x^{th} percentiles (i.e. the 75^{th} percentile row now shows the mean of all incomes between the 70^{th} and 75^{th} percentile).

107. The Association and the Council continued to rely on the income shown in the x^{th} percentile row to show the x^{th} percentile income when they prepared the tables in their main Submission. In light of CRA's different presentation of its data, a calculation must be done to arrive at the income at a certain percentile. Instead of using the x^{th} percentile row as a substitute for the actual x^{th} percentile income, one arrives at the actual x^{th} percentile income by taking the average of the x^{th} percentile row and the $(x+5)^{th}$ percentile row. That is, in order to provide an estimate for the 75^{th} percentile income, one takes the average of the 75^{th} percentile row (the mean of the incomes falling between the 70^{th} and 75^{th} percentile) and the 80^{th} percentile row (the mean of the incomes falling between the 75^{th} and the 80^{th} percentiles).

108. Counsel for the Government brought the difference in the methodology of CRA to the attention of counsel for the Association and the Council. A discussion was then had with a representative of CRA to obtain some clarification on this point. The Association and the Council have now revised Tables 5 and 6 to show the percentile incomes for Canada as calculated according to the new methodology:

109. As can be seen from the above revised tables, there is in fact a greater discrepancy between the judicial salary and the income of self-employed lawyers than initially set out in the Judiciary's Submission.[92] Specifically, in revised Table 6 there is a 30.9% difference between the 2014 judicial salary and the income of self-employed lawyers at the 75th percentile across Canada. The figure in the original Table 6 was 25.8%.

> such policy. Salary depends upon responsibility, individual performance and comparability with relevant markets. Typically, standard practices and techniques are used to evaluate each of these objectively and transparently.[37]

61. While adequate compensation is required to attract outstanding candidates to the Bench, there are particularities in the setting of judicial compensation that the Commission must take into account. In the words of the McLennan Commission:

> The considerations that go into the setting of judicial compensation and benefits are unique, in that so much of the usual process of determining compensation does not apply. Judges cannot speak out and bargain in the usual way. Compensation incentives usual in the private sector, such as bonuses, profit sharing, stock options, at-risk pay, recruitment and performance bonuses, together with the prospect of promotion, do not apply in the judicial context, although many of these financial incentives are increasingly common in the public sector.[38]

62. The need to attract outstanding candidates to the Bench, coupled with the fact that appointees have traditionally predominantly come from private practice, explain the importance of self-employed lawyers' income as a comparator in the determination of judicial salaries. The McLennan Commission made the point succinctly when it said that "it is in the public interest that senior members of the Bar should be attracted to the Bench, and senior members of the Bar are, as a general rule, among the highest earners in private practice."[39]

37 Advisory Committee on Senior Level Retention and Compensation, First Report: January 1998 at 7 [BED at tab 12].

38 McLennan Report (2004) at 5 [JBD at tab 10].

39 McLennan Report (2004) at 32 [JBD at tab 10].

63. Although self-employed lawyers have traditionally been the source of the vast majority of appointments to the Bench, there has been in recent years a declining proportion of appointments from private practice, as illustrated by the following table:

Years	Percentage of appointees from private practice[40]
1990-1999	73%[41]
1997-2004	73%[42]
2004-2007	78%[43]
2007-2011	70%[44]
2015-2020	62%[46]

64. This is a worrisome trend, and all indications are that the decline in appointments from private practice reflects a drop in interest in judicial appointment among lawyers in private practice. A major cause of that drop in interest is necessarily the income gap between what outstanding candidates earn in private practice and the judicial salary.

65. If there were to be an argument seeking to justify the declining trend of appointments from private practice based on the need for greater diversity, it should be noted that at least as far as gender diversity is concerned, the decline evidenced in the above table

40 The decline in the percentage of appointees from private practice is of the same order if appointments from the provincial bench are excluded, going from 82% in the period 1990 to 1999 to 71% in the period 2015 to 2020.

45 Submission of the Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association and the Canadian Judicial Council dated February 29, 2016 at 35, footnote 59 [BED at tab 10].

46 This figure includes five individuals who are described as coming from the “private sector”, which is distinct from “private practice” since the former denotes in-house counsel. The total number of appointees stated to be from private practice for April 1, 2015 to October 2, 2020 was 189, for “sole practice” it was 38, and for private sector it was 5. The latter figure is not material. It was decided to include the “private-sector” lawyers in this category because the larger distinction is with appointments from the public sector. [JBD at tab 21(i)] does not reflect any commensurate gains in that form of diversity.[47] In the 2015-2020 period, women constituted 54% of appointees from the public sector, but they constituted 56% of appointees from private practice.[48] Therefore, it is not the case that gender diversity has been served by a greater proportion of appointees coming from the public sector.

66. The apparent drop in interest in judicial appointments among highly qualified lawyers in private practice is reflected in the statistics on applicants made available to the parties by the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs. According to these statistics, between March 2017 and October 2020, a large percentage of assessed applicants (63%) fell in the category of "unable to recommend" for a judicial appointment.[49] There has been a noticeable drop in interest in judicial appointment among highly qualified lawyers in private practice. In many provinces, the data shows a pool of applicants with a very large proportion falling into the category of "unable to recommend". For example, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland and Labrador, and the Tax Court of Canada have respective percentages of 70%, 65%, 71%, 65%, and 67% for the category of "unable to recommend".[50] In British Columbia, only one of 64 assessed applicants was assessed as "highly recommended". Out of a total of 106 assessed applicants in Alberta, the number of highly recommended applicants was 12.

67. The significant gap between the judicial salary and compensation in private practice is cited by some chief justices as one of the main reasons for the drop in interest among private sector practitioners in applying for a judicial appointment. The Association and Council will invite a member of the Council to appear before the Commission in order to elaborate on these trends.

47 The data currently available to the parties does not provide correlations between other forms of diversity (ethnic, cultural, linguistic, disability) among appointees and their practice background.

48 As set out in footnote 46, this figure includes five individuals who are described as coming from the "private sector", which is distinct from "private practice" since the former denotes in-house counsel. [JBD at tab 21(j)]

49 Based on applications and appointments data provided by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs for March 30, 2017 to October 23, 2020 [JBD at tab 20]. The last two columns on the right, related to appointments, do not include anyone who is found in the "Status of applicants" column. Applicants for the Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal are assessed by the relevant provincial Judicial Advisory Committee (JAC), whereas the Tax Court of Canada has its own JAC, hence explaining why the latter court has its own statistics in the table.

> few very high performers or low performers in a year could significantly affect the average performance pay.[77]

101. The Association and Council did not ask the Levitt Commission to use the total average compensation as the DM-3 comparator, their position in principle being that the Levitt Commission should recommend the prospective implementation of all of the Block Commission salary recommendations. However, the judiciary noted that "there is a significant disparity between the midpoint and actual average figures over the years",[78] adding the following proviso:

> If DM-3 compensation continues to be at the upper end of the salary range and eligible at-risk percentage, future Quadrennial Commissions will likely decide to revisit the Block Commission's use of the midpoint figure rather than the average.[79]

102. The Association and Council submitted before the Rémillard Commissions that the relevant figure for the DM-3 comparator should be the total average compensation of DM-3s – that is, the average base salary plus the average at-risk pay. However, the Rémillard Commission did not accept the Association and Council's submission, reiterating the Block Commission's concern that moving to average salary and performance pay would not "provide a consistent reflection of year over year changes in compensation":

> 50. The difficulty with that proposal is that DM-3s constitute a very small group – currently eight – the compensation of which is subject to considerable variation depending on the exact composition of the group at any given point in time. Previous Commissions have used the DM-3 reference point as "an objective, consistent measure of year over year changes in DM-3 compensation policy". Moving to the total average compensation of a very small group would not meet those criteria. We agree with the Block Commission (2008), which rejected moving to average pay and performance pay because it would not "provide a consistent reflection of year over year changes in compensation".
> 51. Any merit in comparing total average compensation would come from a comparison with a much larger group that could provide objectivity > and consistency, without being inordinately influenced by the individual members of the group at any given time.[80]

103. The circumstances that oblige the Association and Council to raise this question anew are the following. Since 2017, and for the first time since this metric is tallied, the salary portion of the compensation of DM-3s, and, as a result, the Block Comparator, has remained unchanged while the actual compensation of DM-3s has steadily increased. The consequence is that judicial salaries no longer retain a relationship with the actual compensation of DM-3s if the Block Comparator is used as the point of comparison.[81] In 2019, DM-3 total average compensation was $383,454, or $53,554 greater than the judicial salary for the same year.

104. Two discernable trends are illustrated in the following graph: a disparity between the Block Comparator and the actual average DM-3 compensation figures, which disparity has persisted through the past three quadrennial cycles; and second, an increasing delta between the total average compensation of DM-3s and the judicial salary.

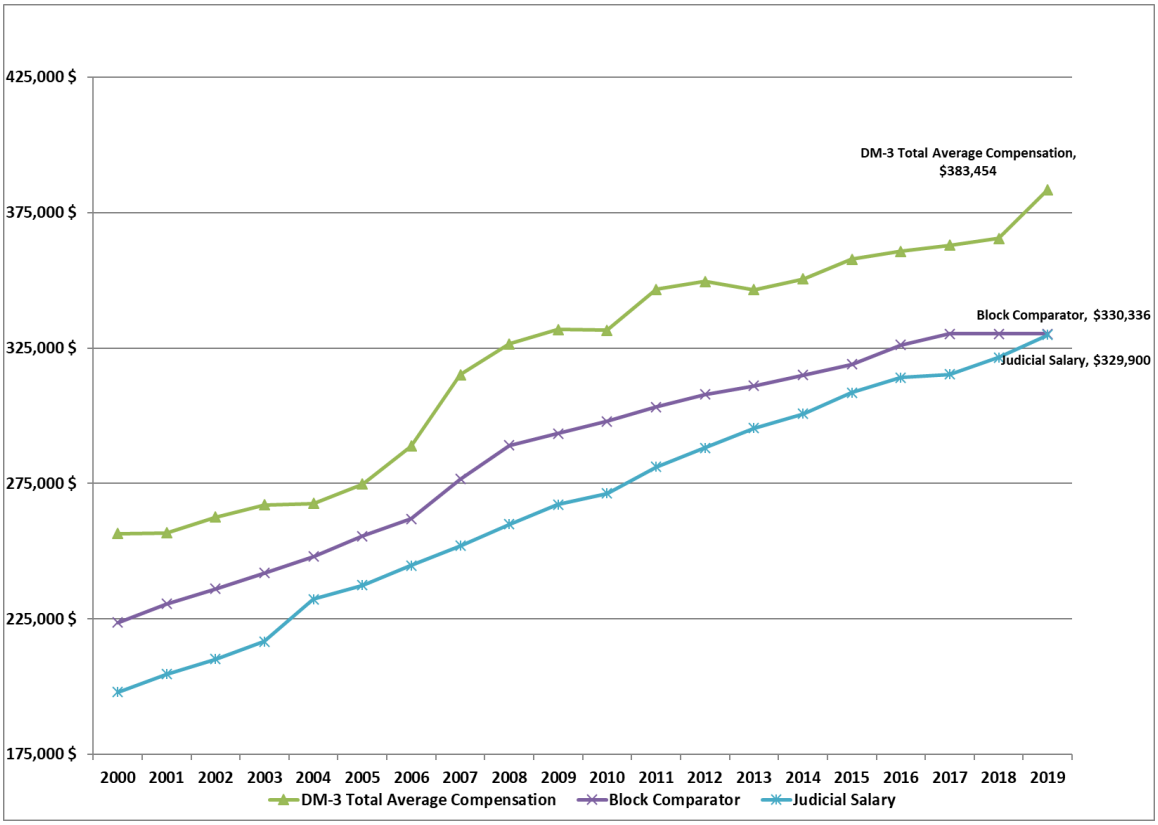
Comparison of DM-3 Total Average Compensation, Block Comparator and Judicial Salary (2000-2019)



105. These trends have become much more pronounced since the last cycle because of the unprecedented and quite uncharacteristic flat-lining of the Block Comparator since 2017. The tables below show how both the DM-3 and DM-4 salary ranges (and therefore the mid-point) have remained static for the last four years.

* Due to the sample size, DM-4s average salary has been supressed by the Government.

106. Since the Block Comparator tracks the mid-point salary range and half of the eligible at-risk pay, regardless of the actual compensation received by DM-3s, the unprecedented flatlining of these components while the actual compensation progressed appears to have subverted the very purpose of the comparator. As a result of the static nature of the DM-3 salary range and Block Comparator, the gap between the Block Comparator and the DM-3 total average compensation (average salary plus total average performance pay) has grown to -13.9% ($53,118) in 2019, the largest reported difference since 2000 (see table below).

beneficial.[111] Needless to say, the higher the income, the greater the benefit in having that income retained in a corporation. Relatedly, higher income is correlated with seniority and expertise.

140. As such, the CRA data fails to capture income earned by the senior members of entire firms, or indeed of the entire legal profession in certain regions such as metropolitan areas where the profession's members earn high incomes.

141. Before the Rémillard Commission, the Association and Council took the position that the gap between self-employed lawyer incomes as shown by the CRA data and judicial salaries would be even greater if the income of lawyers practising through professional corporations were taken into account.[112] This view is supported by the expert evidence provided by Mr. Leblanc and Mr. Pickler.[113]

142. Other evidentiary elements further corroborate the fact that the CRA data under-reports the actual income of self-employed lawyers.[114] For example, in the context of a recent inquiry into gender disparity at major law firms in Canada, the Globe and Mail cited average compensation levels at a national law firm. At the firm in question, female partners earned on average 25% less than male partners, that percentage translating into an average of $200,000 less. This means that male partners earned on average $800,000 and female partners earned on average $600,000.[115]

143. In light of the significant gap between self-employed lawyer incomes as represented in the CRA data and the judicial salary, and considering the increasing number of high-earning lawyers excluded from this data given their use of professional corporations, it is unsurprising that the judiciary is experiencing difficulty, in some regions, in attracting outstanding candidates from private practice to the Bench.

113 Report of Stéphane Leblanc and André Pickler at 3 [Appendix B].

114 We note that given competitive and privacy reasons, it is difficult to obtain compensation information for senior lawyers in private practice, as has recently been confirmed by the Globe and Mail. R. Doolittle, "Major Canadian law firms willing to release wage-gap data", Globe and Mail (25 February 2021) [BED at tab 31].

115 R. Doolittle & C. Dobby, "Female partners earned 25 percent less than their male colleagues at a major Toronto law firm, document shows", Globe and Mail (9 February 2021) [BED at tab 30].

144. Moreover, although self-employed lawyers have been the source, traditionally, of the vast majority of appointments to the Bench, there is a declining proportion of appointments from private practice (approximately 75% between 1990 and 2007, 70% between 2007 and 2011, and approximately 63% between 2011 and 2020), as set out in the section above regarding the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary.

145. It follows from the foregoing that the real gap between the incomes earned by self-employed lawyers and the judicial salary is significantly greater than that reflected in the CRA data. The CRA data does not form a reliable basis, in that it is not complete, to calculate the appropriate comparator from private practice. The real gap between the incomes earned by self-employed lawyers and the judicial salary is an obstacle to garnering interest in a judicial appointment from outstanding members of the Bar. This trend strikes at the heart of the criterion set out in the Judges Act regarding the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary.

d) Salary recommendation sought by the Association and Council

146. Based on the comparators, whether it be the DM-3 comparator or the income of self-employed lawyers, the current judicial salary is inadequate and must be increased. The statutory criterion of attracting outstanding candidates to the Bench demands it.

147. The judicial salary lags significantly behind the total average compensation of DM-3s, which most accurately reflects the actual compensation of DM-3s, on average. As of April 1, 2019, the gap between total average DM-3 compensation and the salary of a puisne judge was $53,544, a difference of -14%. Assuming the judicial salary is adjusted in accordance with the projected IAI, it is projected to reach $378,687 by April 1, 2023. The projected total average compensation for DM-3s will by then be $413,725. A gap of $35,038 (-8.5%) will remain. This is higher than the already significant 7.3% gap that the Levitt Commission said "tests the limits of rough equivalence".[116]

148. In such circumstances, the Association and Council submit that based on the statutory criteria, the Commission should, at a minimum, recommend an increase of the judicial salary to partially bridge the significant gap that exists between the judicial salary and the DM-3 comparator. This gap will continue to exist for the foreseeable future. It bears

3) Third Criterion: No Difficulty Attracting Outstanding Candidates

a) Consider the Pools from which Judges Drawn

41. As noted by the Rémillard Commission, all parties agree that Canada has an outstanding judiciary. That report also pointed out that while it is necessary to set judicial salaries at a level that will not deter outstanding candidates from applying to the judiciary, financial factors are not the only, or even the major, factor in attracting outstanding candidates. Other factors, such as the desire to serve the public, security of tenure and availability of supernumerary status and the quality of life associated with judicial office, are all important incentives for accepting appointment to the judiciary.[45]

42. The statistics collected by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs show that there is no shortage of interested and highly qualified candidates for judicial positions. For example, as of October 23, 2020, Judicial Advisory Committees across Canada had 925 fully-assessed applications. Of these, 140 appointments were made, 183 other individuals were "recommended" but not appointed, and 105 other candidates were "highly recommended" but not appointed.[46] Put another way, for every individual appointed to the bench, there were approximately two other candidates who are fully qualified, recommended and awaiting possible appointment.

43. Further, as set out by the Block Commission, "the issue is not how to attract the highest earners; the issue is how to attract outstanding candidates" from both private and public sectors, from large and small firms, and from large and small centres.[47] Or as the

Drouin Commission noted, "no segment of the legal profession has a monopoly on outstanding candidates".[48]

44. Based on the evidence heard by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the third criterion, "the need to attract outstanding candidates to the judiciary", was prescribed when the Judges Act was amended in 1998.[49] This criterion was intended to address recruitment—what was necessary in order to "attract" senior members of the Bar to judicial office.

> However, taking the point about the criteria, we do always have to be measuring how we compensate our judges against that body of people from which we are drawing to ensure that we are competitive. [50]

45. The first Quadrennial Commission, the Drouin Commission, understood that subsection 26(1.1) of the Judges Act expressly mandates consideration of this relationship:

> The criterion identified in subsection 26(1.1)(c), for example, is directed expressly to the issue of recruitment of suitable candidates for the Bench. Traditionally, most judges in Canada are appointed from the ranks of private legal practitioners. Accordingly, those factors constituting incentives or disincentives to the seeking of judicial office by private legal practitioners are relevant to recruitment of judicial candidates.[51]

46. The analysis below shows that the majority of judicial appointments continue to be from the private sector and that there is no evidence that there is any difficulty in attracting high quality candidates from the private sector.

47. Between 2015 and 2020, of the 372 lawyers appointed to the judiciary, 62% were from private practice and 38% from other sectors—federal and provincial government lawyers, legal aid lawyers, academics and the provincial court judiciary. This is consistent with the percentages from the last Quadrennial Commission process, where 64% of appointees were from the private sector and 36% of appointees were from other sectors. Indeed, the small drop in private sector appointees appears to be as a result of more provincial court judges being appointed to the federal bench.[52]

A. Purpose of Report

1. I am president and actuary with JDM Actuarial Expert Services Inc. I regularly provide actuarial consulting services as well as actuarial expert testimony. I am a fellow of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries and of the Society of Actuaries. I received my Actuarial Fellowship in 1980 and have provided pension, benefits and actuarial consulting services for approximately 43 years. A copy of my curriculum vitae is attached as Appendix 1.

2. I understand and acknowledge that as an expert, I have a duty to provide evidence in this proceeding as follows:

   a. to provide opinion evidence that is fair, objective and non-partisan;

   b. to provide opinion evidence that is related only to matters that are within my area of expertise; and

   c. to provide such additional assistance as the 2020 Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission (the "Quadrennial Commission") may reasonably require.

3. I acknowledge that the duty referred to above prevails over any obligation that I may owe to any party by whom or on whose behalf I am engaged.

4. This report has been prepared for the Department of Justice of the Government of Canada.

5. The purpose of this report is to:

   a. review and provide my opinion on data provided by Canada Revenue Agency about self-employed earnings of lawyers in Canada;

   b. provide comments about issues to consider regarding the total compensation (earnings, benefits, pension and any other remuneration) of self-employed lawyers, deputy ministers and similar positions of the Government of Canada and federally appointed judges;

   c. provide cost estimates of the judicial annuity that provides a lifetime pension to federally appointed judges upon their retirement as well as providing a pension in the event of permanent disability; and

   d. provide comments and my opinion about future changes in the Industrial Aggregate Index.

6. The intended users of this report are the Department of Justice, the Quadrennial Commission, and the various parties appearing before the Commission. The report should not be provided to anyone who is not an intended user except as may be required by law. The findings herein should not be relied upon by any party other than an intended user.

B. Executive Summary

7. This report takes a look at the income and total compensation of various jobs with the goal of assisting the Department of Justice prepare their submission to the Quadrennial Commission and also assist the Quadrennial Commission in their review of compensation for federally appointed judges.

8. In this report,

   a. I determine the value of the Judicial Annuity that is available to federally appointed judges upon retirement from the bench;

   b. I review recent compensation for self-employed lawyers, deputy ministers and government appointments to senior roles in government agencies;

   c. I establish a total compensation for each of these positions so that compensation can be viewed on an "apples to apples" basis; and

   d. I present the results of my analyses along with comments on a number of compensation issues related to these positions, but I make no recommendations.

9. There are many ways to compensate someone for performing work. It starts with salary or wages. Adding to that is commissions, overtime, vacation, bonuses (also referred to as performance pay, at-risk pay, etc.), health and welfare benefits, pension plan, stock options, etc. The sum of all these forms of compensation is referred to as total compensation.

10. Not every job comes with the same components of compensation and even when they do, each of the components are likely worth different amounts. To provide a fair basis for any comparisons, I determine a total compensation for each of the jobs referenced herein. Total compensation allows us to compare like with like.

11. Two jobs may have different salaries, but the total compensation may be the similar. Two jobs may have similar salaries, but the total compensation may be very different. If we compare two jobs on the basis of salary only, it devalues potentially large differences in other aspects of compensation.

12. The Judges Act sets out a number of judicial positions and annual salaries, including prothonotaries, puisne judges, and judges of the Supreme Court. I understand that the salary for each of these positions can be expressed as a percentage adjustment to the salary or a puisne judge. In this report, I refer to the salary of a puisne judge as the Base Judicial Salary. For the year beginning 1 April 2020, the salary for puisne judges is $338,800. The salary for a prothonotary is currently set at 80% of the Base Judicial Salary, which is $271,000 beginning 1 April 2020. Similar calculations can be performed for other positions.

13. Base Judicial Salary is not appropriate for comparison with other jobs. For a fair comparison, we need to use total compensation. In this report, I have focussed on the total compensation for puisne judges. But, for federally appointed judges, the value of their pension varies based on their age at appointment and therefore their total compensation will vary based on their age at appointment. To simplify matters and to provide a reasonable basis for any comparisons of compensation, I calculate an average amount of total compensation for puisne judges that reflects the age distribution of all judges when appointed. I refer to that as Base Judicial Total Compensation. To determine the total compensation of the other judicial positions, one can apply the same percentage as we would apply to the Base Judicial Salary to obtain the base salary of that other position[1].

14. In this report, I review the salaries of the federally appointed judges and of deputy ministers and calculate their total compensation. I was also provided with the net income amounts for self-employed lawyers in Canada between 2015 and 2019 by the Canada Revenue Agency. I have reviewed it and present summaries of that data from various perspectives. The net income of the self-employed lawyers is their total compensation[2].

15. The goal is to provide a series of total compensation amounts with a fair relationship to each other. Those amounts are set out in Tables 280, 281 and 282.

Increase in Base Judicial Salary as of 1 April 2021

16. Base Judicial Salary is $338,800 for the year 1 April 2020 to 31 March 2021. Under the Judges Act, and subject to any adjustments recommended by the Quadrennial Commission, it will be adjusted effective 1 April 2021 by changes in the Industrial

1 The result of using the same percentage as one would apply to Base Judicial Salary will actually result in a small understatement of the total compensation of prothonotaries and a small overstatement of total compensation for all other judicial positions. Those over and understatements are each less than $1,000 and are not material for the purposes of this report.

2 Normally, the cost of health and welfare benefits form part of total compensation. Self-employed lawyers can provide health and welfare benefits for themselves as part of their business expenses that are paid out of gross income prior to the calculation of net-income. Health and welfare benefits also would normally form part of both judicial and deputy minister total compensation. To avoid having to make hundreds of adjustments to the income amounts herein for each of lawyers, judges and deputy ministers, I have chosen to simply ignore it since its value is not materially different between these positions.

Aggregate, a data series maintained by Statistics Canada that measures changes in the average earnings of Canadians.

17. I have estimated that increase will be 6.74%, raising the Base Judicial Salary to $361,600 effective 1 April 2021.

Effect on Base Judicial Total Compensation[3]

18. I determined that on average, the Base Judicial Total Compensation for 2019 to 2020 (based on the $329,900 Base Judicial Salary effective April 2019) is $496,000. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $496,000 in 2019, I estimate that would be about the 88th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

19. I determined that on average, the Base Judicial Total Compensation for 2020 to 2021 (based on the $338,800 Base Judicial Salary) is $509,400. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $509,400 in 2020, I estimate that would be about the 88th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

20. I also determined that on average, the Base Judicial Total Compensation for 2021 to 2022 (based on the $361,600 I estimated above) will be $543,800. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $543,800 in 2021, I estimate that would be about the 89th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

Effect on Total Compensation of Prothonotaries

21. For April 2019 to March 2020, the base salary of a prothonotary was $263,900, from April 2020 to March 2021 it is $271,000 and I estimate beginning April 2021 it will be $289,200 (80% of the Base Judicial Salary).

22. I determined that the total compensation of a prothonotary for 2019 to 2020 (based on 80% of the Base Judicial Total Compensation and adjusting for a $600 understatement (see footnote 1)) is $397,300. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $397,300 in 2019, I estimate that would be about the 82nd percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

23. I determined that the total compensation of a prothonotary for 2020 to 2021 (using the same basis as for 2019-2020) is $408,100. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $408,100 in 2020, I estimate that would be about the 82nd percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

3 Details of these calculations are at paragraphs 153 and following.

24. I also determined that the total compensation of a prothonotary for 2021 to 2022 (using the same basis as for 2019-2020) is estimated to be $435,500. If a self-employed lawyer had a net income of $435,500 in 2021, I estimate that would be about the 86th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

C. Introduction

25. I was retained by the Department of Justice to prepare a report to assist the Quadrennial Commission in their review of judicial compensation.

26. In preparing this report, I have assumed that the most appropriate perspective is to look at total compensation and the individual components that comprise total compensation.

27. As with past reports for prior Quadrennial Commissions, I have reviewed data regarding net income for self-employed lawyers to provide one comparator for compensation. I also have reviewed compensation of senior deputy ministers within the Government of Canada and appointments to senior government agencies as another objective factor.

28. I have approached the report in the following order:

    a. General comments and opinions on compensation topics.

    b. Review of the current situation for federal judges with respect to salary, the Judicial Annuity, disability income and health and welfare benefits.

    c. Review of compensation for lawyers in private practice with respect to net income, retirement savings, disability and health and welfare benefits.

    d. Review of compensation for senior deputy ministers with respect to the same components.

    e. Relationship of current judicial compensation to that of lawyers and deputy ministers.

29. In this report, where I refer to a lawyer, it should be taken as meaning a self-employed lawyer unless the context clearly indicates otherwise.

30. In this report, where I refer to a judge, it should be taken as meaning a federally appointed judge. There are no exceptions.

D. Comments and Opinions on Relevant Compensation Topics

Total Compensation vs Cash Compensation

31. There are many ways that a person can be compensated for work. In almost all situations, compensation starts with salary, base pay, hourly wage rate or some similar measure (herein referred to as "salary"). An individual may also be entitled to other forms of compensation[4], such as bonuses, commissions, performance incentives, stock options, benefits, retirement savings, health club membership, etc.

32. When comparing compensation between jobs, it is rare that looking only at cash compensation provides a true picture of any differences.

33. Total compensation is a measure that looks at all forms of pay, including cash compensation, and determines a total value. In comparing the compensation between two organisations, total compensation provides a more accurate result. For example, Acme Company might provide their employees with a full suite of health and welfare benefits as well as a generous pension plan. Boden Corporation might prefer to forego the health, welfare and pension plans and instead pay salaries that are about 25% larger. An employee at Acme who discovers the higher salaries at Boden may be led to change employers – at least until finding out about the difference in the other forms of compensation. Presumably they would only change employers if they determine that the total compensation from Acme is less than the total compensation from Boden.

34. Comparing two jobs on the basis of salary only is to devalue potentially large differences in other aspects of compensation.

Retirement Savings

35. One component of compensation is retirement income accumulation. While many Canadians[5] enjoy an employer-sponsored retirement plan, most Canadians are left to 4 Some of these other forms of compensation may also be paid in cash, but they do not form part of "salary" since there is normally an element of risk, or uncertainty regarding the amount to be received or there is a delay before any amount will be payable.

5 Obtaining data about membership in an employer-sponsored pension plan is very difficult. Many references are made to the Report on Trusteed Pension Plans published periodically by Statistics Canada. But that report does not include the many pension plans that are not trusteed. It also ignores the organisations that do not sponsor a registered pension plan but rather provide retirement savings through a group RRSP. Statistics Canada publishes a report on registered pension plan membership (but that also ignores group RRSPs) that shows 37.5% of paid workers are members of a registered pension plan in 2018. [https://www150.statcan.gc.ca/n1/daily-quotidien/200813/t002b-eng.htm].

look after their personal retirement saving on their own, generally through contributing to a personal Registered Retirement Savings Plan ("RRSP").

36. There are many different types of retirement plans in Canada. Most retirement plans provided by an employer require part of the annual contribution to be paid by the employees and the balance by the employer. A few plans are funded entirely by the employer with no contribution required from employees[6]. Where there is no retirement plan offered by the employer, the entire cost of retirement savings is borne by the individual employee.

37. For the vast majority, if not all self-employed lawyers, retirement savings are funded entirely out of the individual's earnings. Under the Income Tax Act[7], self-employed persons are not permitted to sponsor or earn benefits under a registered pension plan leaving the only options an RRSP or non-tax-sheltered savings.

38. For federally appointed judges, the Judicial Annuity provides retirement income with the judges paying 7% of income each year until they are eligible for an unreduced annuity at which time, contributions decrease to 1% of income[8]. Canada is responsible for the balance of the total cost which is paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

39. To properly reflect retirement savings costs for self-employed lawyers and for federally appointed judges, we need to consider their differing opportunities and differing costs for retirement saving.

Health and Welfare Benefits

40. Most employers provide a selection of health and welfare or group insurance benefits. Typically, these include life insurance, medical and drug benefits and dental benefits.

41. The value of these to an individual depends on how much the benefits are used, usually with respect to prescription drugs and dental.

42. Some employers provide these benefits at no cost to employees, while others may require part of the cost to be paid by employees. Canada pays all costs related to the health and welfare benefits of judges. Self-employed lawyers will typically pay for these benefits out of their gross income.

6 In 2019, 5.7 million Canadians were members of a pension plan requiring employee contributions. 0.7 million Canadians were members of a pension plan where they did not have to contribute. [Statistics Canada data table 11-10-0106-01]

8 Judges Act R.S.C., 1985, c. J-1, section 50(2)

Disability

43. Disability income protection is generally provided through a combination of short-term and long-term disability[9]. In my experience, short-term disability is usually entirely paid by the employer while long-term disability varies – due to income tax implications, usually paid entirely by the employer or entirely by the employee.

44. Self-employed lawyers will typically pay for long-term disability insurance out of their income and will typically self-fund for short-term disability.

45. Short-term disability protection is provided to judges by a continuation of salary. Long-term disability income protection is provided through the Judicial Annuity for a permanent disability and by a continuation of salary for a non-permanent disability.

46. Based on actuarial tables regarding disability claim rates, most people will never claim a disability benefit. In my experience, many people believe it is not an important benefit to have or the cost is too much to be worth having. For those that do have a disability, it is invaluable. As one ages, the chances of having a disability claim increases. At young ages, disability will normally arise from an accident, but as one ages, illnesses such as cancers, cardiovascular and mental health issues become increasingly prevalent in addition to accidents and lead to a greater likelihood of claims.

47. While the incidence rate is small in any single year, it becomes much larger over a number of years and especially as one ages. The actuarial assumptions I used show that 0.02% of judges at age 40 (that's two of every 10,000 judges) are expected to become permanently disabled. That rises to 0.1% by age 52 (10 of every 10,000), to 0.2% by age 60 (20 of every 10,000) and to 1.0% at age 74 (100 of every 10,000).

48. The average annual incidence over all ages is about 0.3% (30 of every 10,000 judges).

49. The Department of Justice provided me with historic data on judges who incurred a permanent disability. From 1985 to 2020, 94 federally appointed judges have become permanently disabled. I estimate that the actuarial assumption about disability would result in about the same number of expected permanent disabilities.

[9] Short-term disability usually starts on the first day of absence due to illness or injury or shortly thereafter and continues for anywhere from about three-months to about a year. At the end of that time, long-term disability, if it exists, will commence and normally provide income protection up to recovery or age 65.

50. Both the average and median age of permanent disability was 63 following 11 years of service.

51. For a judge appointed at age 53, there is an 8.8% probability of becoming permanently disabled before age 75. But that 53-year-old would have achieved entitlement to a full retirement annuity at age 68, so there is no additional financial protection from the disability benefit after age 68.

52. For a judge appointed at age 53, there is a 4.3% probability of becoming permanently disabled before age 68.

53. While an annual probability of 0.3% may make the disability benefit sound like it is not worth very much, a probability of 4.3% (1 person out of every 23) becoming permanently disabled over a 15-year period between age 53 and 68 should cause most people to reconsider the value of permanent disability protection.

54. Since 1985, there have been 1,495 judges who have left the bench (retirement, disability or death). 94 of those were due to permanent disability – 6.3% of all judges leaving the bench. That includes judges who became permanently disabled after having qualified for a full retirement annuity and where the disability annuity did not provide any additional financial protection.

55. We can conclude that about 4.3% of judges will become permanently disabled prior to qualifying for a full annuity and 2.0% will become permanently disabled after qualifying for a full annuity.

Supernumerary Status

56. A valuable benefit available to judges is the ability to elect supernumerary status, where the judge is given a reduced workload and continues to receive full compensation. I was informed by the Department of Justice that there is no specific reference, but it is generally accepted that typically, the workload is about 50%.

57. To be eligible for supernumerary status, the judge must have served at least 15 years as a federally appointed judge and have a sum of age plus years of service totalling at least 80, or be at least 70 years old with at least ten years of service as a federally appointed judge. An exception is judges of the Supreme Court who are not eligible for supernumerary status. Judges may sit as a supernumerary for a maximum of ten years or to age 75, whichever comes first.

58. Judges appointed prior to age 55 who meet the conditions to elect supernumerary status are also eligible to retire on a full unreduced retirement annuity. Judges appointed after age 55 become eligible for supernumerary status prior to their entitlement to a full retirement annuity, but they can grow into a full annuity by continuing in service in either a full-time or supernumerary status. At the time of first eligibility for supernumerary status, the amount of retirement annuity as a percent of Judicial Base Salary is:

Table 58 – Retirement Annuity at First Eligibility for Supernumerary Status

59. Basically, once having met the conditions required for electing supernumerary status, the decision for a judge is to:

a. Continue to work with a full caseload and receive full compensation;

b. Elect supernumerary status and continue to work approximately half-time and receive full compensation; or

c. Retire and receive a retirement annuity.

60. The financial benefits of this option for a judge are immediately obvious. But it is also a benefit for Canada. Rather than risk losing an experienced judge to retirement, there is a major incentive for the judge to continue in service, but at a reduced caseload. From the financial perspective, if the judge retired, the Judicial Annuity becomes payable at 2/3^{rds} of full compensation (subject to a reduction in some situations due to retiring early). By continuing as a supernumerary, the judge receives full compensation – a difference of between 33.3% and 55.6% of the full compensation.

61. For Canada, the average cost of a supernumerary judge is about 38% of the full compensation[10] while the supernumerary judge carries about 50% of a full caseload.

62. As of 1 March 2021, there are 1,206 federally appointed judges in Canada of whom 292 are supernumeraries[11]. That is just under 25% of all judges.

63. I reviewed the statistics of 1,495 judges who left the bench between 1985 and 2020 (see table 267 for additional details). Of those judges,

    a. 1% of judges did not qualify for supernumerary status prior to age 75;

    b. 19% retired prior to qualifying for supernumerary status;

    c. 80% attained eligibility for electing supernumerary status, of whom:

        i. 8% chose to retire rather than elect supernumerary status; and

        ii. 72% elected supernumerary status and 90% of them (65% of all judges) so elected within one year of becoming eligible.

64. I estimated the average length of service as a supernumerary during the period 1985 to 2020 was 6.0 years. That lengthened slightly to 6.2 years for the supernumeraries serving between 2000 and 2020. The average age at which a judge elects supernumerary status is 68 with an average of about 18 to 19 years of service.

65. As of the end of 2020, there were 336 judges who had met the eligibility conditions for supernumerary status. 292 had previously elected to serve as supernumeraries (87% of all those eligible) and 44 remained serving full-time (13% of those eligible).

66. In my experience with organisations in the private sector, if an employee is permitted to elect a reduced workload, it is accompanied by an equivalent reduction in pay. But within the private sector, the payment of pensions is normally from a different source[12]

10 Or slightly less due to some judges delaying their election beyond their first eligibility or never electing supernumerary status. The 37.6% average cost to Canada is the difference between 100% of Base Judicial Salary and the 62.4% average retirement annuity percent from Table 58.

11 https://www.fja-cmf.gc.ca/appointments-nominations/judges-juges-eng.aspx

12 In the private sector, pensions are paid out of the pension plan, which is an entity separate and apart from the employer. Any benefit to an employer from an employee delaying retirement within the private sector is at best indirect. Private sector employers who do not sponsor a pension plan have no economic … incentive to pay full-time income for part-time work, since an employee's pension is from the employee's own savings and there is no direct or indirect offset to the compensation paid. For the federally appointed judges, both compensation and the Judicial Annuity are paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

than the employer's payroll, so the economic advantage of paying 100% of compensation for about 50% of work is very different.

67. It is clear that the availability of supernumerary status is valued by judges with the majority of them electing to spend their final years on the bench as a supernumerary.

68. I have looked at ways to calculate a value for this benefit and am not satisfied that any of my approaches is sufficiently robust and impartial between the parties. As a result, in my opinion, the availability of electing supernumerary status has a financial value that is intangible. I have not included any value for this as part of the Base Judicial Total Compensation (see paragraph 104).

Industrial Aggregate Increases ("IAI")

69. The Judges Act sets out how federally appointed judges' salaries are determined each year. Increases are effective as of 1 April in each calendar year. An adjustment factor is calculated based on the year over year change in the Industrial Aggregate, a data series maintained by Statistics Canada[13]. The factor is based on the most recently available data as of the first day of the period for which the salary amount is determined.

70. The Industrial Aggregate measures the number of working Canadians and their average weekly earnings. There are some types of jobs, like farming, fishing and military that are excluded. Earnings are tracked and the Industrial Aggregate is updated monthly. The Industrial Aggregate can be considered as similar to the Consumer Price Index except the Consumer Price Index tracks prices of items that are typically purchased by Canadian consumers whereas the Industrial Aggregate tracks the number of workers in Canada and their earnings[14].

71. In this report, when referring to the data series, I use the term Industrial Aggregate. Judges' salaries are adjusted annually by the percent change in the Industrial Aggregate value. I will refer to percent changes in the Industrial Aggregate as "IAI".

72. Based on Statistics Canada's publication schedule, there is usually a two-month lag between workers' pay dates and the publication of the Industrial Aggregate. For example, the Industrial Aggregate data that is published in February reports on workers and wages as of the previous December. Based on the data available as of 13 I have assumed that the data series referenced is the one identified by Statistics Canada as "Average weekly earnings by industry, monthly, unadjusted for seasonality", series 14-10-0203-01 and specifically, the sub-series "Industrial Aggregate excluding unclassified businesses".

14 Ibid.

early March 2021 (data for December 2020) and my assumption about how the calculation is to be done[15], I have determined the increase in judges' salaries will likely be 6.74% in 2021.

73. In the past fifteen years, the increase in Base Judicial Salary due to changes in the IAI has varied from 0.40% to 3.60% with an average of 2.42%. The average increase over the past five years (2015 to 2020) was 1.90%.

74. What has given rise to this large increase expected in 2021? Covid-19.

75. Business in Canada was largely shut down in March 2020 and many workers were laid off. The loss of jobs and of income was first reflected in the Industrial Aggregate reported for April 2020. The IAI increased by 5.7% from March to April.

76. The vast majority of workers who lost their jobs and income were from the lower paying jobs – work that could not be performed from home and work that is impacted by lockdowns, such as retail some of the service industry and manufacturing[16]. For those with higher paying jobs, their employment status was mainly unaffected by the closure of business as many of those jobs could be performed from home.

77. If a lower-paid worker suffers a large reduction in income but remains employed, the Industrial Aggregate will decrease. But if a lower-paid worker loses their job, they disappear from the calculation of the average and the Industrial Aggregate will increase[17]. With Covid-19, that increase in the Industrial Aggregate happened suddenly as about 2.9 million workers lost their jobs or were laid off in the second half of March and early April 2020[18].

78. In particular, the increase in IAI during 2020 was not because of workers receiving large wage increases, it was primarily because of workers losing their income.

17 Consider four numbers – 8, 10, 12 and 14. The average is 11. If the 8 is reduced to 4, the average reduces to 10. But if the 8 is simply removed (as would happen with a lay-off or job loss), the average increases to 12.

How Does 2.9 Million Workers Getting Laid-off Cause Average Income to Increase?

Suppose that in February there are 2.9 million workers earning between $13 and $30 per hour with an average of $19.00 per hour. They work an average of 1,800 hours per year. That's an average annual income of $34,200 ($19.00 x 1,800). These 2.9 million workers do not know it, but they are about to lose their jobs.

In addition, there are 13.5 million workers that make between $13 per hour and several million dollars per year*. The average weekly income of those 13.5 million workers is $1,135, or just under $60,000 per annum.

Very roughly, that is the make-up of Canadian workers.

The average weekly income of all the 16.4 million workers is $1,051, or $54,700 per annum. That average income lies between the $34,200 annual amount for the 2.9 million workers and the $60,000 for the 13.5 million workers – as we would expect from averages.

Based on these assumptions, the Industrial Aggregate for February would be 1,051 – the average weekly income of the 16.4 million workers.

What happens when those 2.9 million workers get laid off in March and April? Their data simply disappears from the calculation. Instead of calculating the average income of 16.4 million workers, we calculate the average income of the remaining 13.5 million workers. Their incomes have not changed – there were no wage increases in March and April.

In May, the 13.5 million workers are still making an average weekly income of $1,135 – the same as in the second paragraph above. That is the total for all workers in May. So, the Industrial Aggregate for May is 1,135 - the average weekly income of the 13.5 million remaining workers.

Between February and May, the Industrial Aggregate has increased from 1,051 to 1,135. That's an increase of 8.0% - all because 2.9 million Canadians got laid-off from work.

* This group includes some workers that make between $13 and $30 per hour, but they are not at risk for losing their job when Covid-19 hits.

Estimated increase without the Covid-19 Effect

79. If we had not experienced Covid-19 and assuming 2020 would have been similar to the average year with respect to wages of all Canadians, it is likely that the Industrial Aggregate would have increased but just not as much. In this section, I estimate what that increase would have been by looking at the budget plans for wage increases of employers across Canada.

80. A number of employee benefits and compensation consulting firms conduct compensation surveys to gather information on corporate budget plans for compensation increases in the following year.

81. Morneau Shepell[19] reported a budgeted average salary increase of 1.9% for 2021. If those expected to receive no increase are excluded, the average increase is budgeted as 2.5% for 2021. However, they report that 46% of survey respondents remained undecided at the time of responding to the survey. They also reported that in 2020, base salaries increased by 1.6% on average. If those whose salaries were frozen are excluded, the average increase in 2020 was 2.6%. Morneau Shepell's survey results showed that 36% of organisations froze salaries in 2020 compared with only 2% that had budgeted for a freeze. I assume that most, if not all of those changes were a response to Covid-19.

82. Normandin Beaudry[20] report an average budgeted salary increase for 2021 of 2.6%, excluding organisations that plan to freeze salaries. When those organisations that plan to freeze salaries are included, the average increase was lower by between 0.1% for organisations that have experienced little negative effect to a positive effect from Covi-19 to 0.5% lower for organisations with a negative effect from Covid-19.

83. Mercer[21] report that 2021 budgets average 2.3% for total salary increases. If the 13% of organisations that plan to have no salary increase are excluded, the average increase is budgeted to be 2.4% for 2021, compared with 2.6% for 2020.

84. Based on the various surveys of budgeted salary increases for 2021, it appears that the average will be between 2.0% and 2.5%. The survey results indicated a similar average was budgeted for 2020 increases prior to changes resulting from Covid-19.

85. In my opinion, based on the results of these three surveys of employer plans for salary adjustments, had there not been an employment disruption from Covid-19, the increase in the IAI for the 2021 judicial salary increase would likely have been between 2.0% and 2.5% with a similar increase in the IAI for 2022 increases.

Effect on IAI Increases in Future Years

86. In February 2020, there were 16.4 million workers included in the Industrial Aggregate earnings average. Three months later, there were 13.5 million workers, a decrease of

2.9 million. The loss of 2.9 million jobs resulted in an immediate 8.0% increase in the average industrial wage in Canada[22].

87. By December 2020, 2.3 million workers had returned to work. The Industrial Aggregate has decreased since May due to their return. The 8.0% increase between February and May had dropped to a 7.0% increase between February and December[23].

88. If the 550,000 workers who have still not returned to work are mostly at the bottom of the wage continuum, it is likely the Industrial Aggregate will decrease as and if they return to work. If all 550,000 were to return to work in 2021 and if their average earnings are less than $20 per hour, I estimate the IAI will further decrease by between 0.5% and 1.0%.

89. It is likely that decrease will be offset by wage increases granted to all workers in 2021. In paragraph 85, I estimated the increase to judicial salaries in the absence of Covid-19 would be between 2.0% and 2.5% for the April 2022 changes. Combining that with the effect of 550,000 more laid-off workers returning to work gives a net change in the IAI of between 1.0% and 2.0%. If less than 550,000 of those laid-off workers return to work, I estimate the change in the IAI for April 2022 will lie in the range of 1.0% to 2.5%.

90. In a letter from François Lemire, Director of the Office of the Chief Actuary for Canada to Anna Dekker dated 26 February 2021, Mr. Lemire sets out the Chief Actuary's current estimate for future changes in the IAI. He references the recent increase in Industrial Aggregate was caused by employment losses and that future decreases in the Industrial Aggregate are expected. His assumption for future changes in the IAI would result in increases to Judicial Base Salary of 6.7% in 2021 and 2.1% in 2022[24]. That 2.1% increase for 2022 lies within the range I have estimated, but it is at the upper end of the range. Based on my calculations, it likely assumes few of the remaining laid-off workers will return to work.

Weighted Averages

91. In the discussions in this report about income and benefits, many of the items vary by age. Sometimes the variance is by age of appointment and sometimes it is by current 22 Statistics Canada, Industrial Aggregate Index, Table: 14-10-0203-01.

23 Ibid.

24 He included assumptions for future years of 2.6% in 2023, 2.8% in 2024, 2.9% in 2025 and 3.0% in 2026 and beyond.

age. It can be helpful in those situations to also know the average amount. In addition, amounts may vary by province or by Census Metropolitan Areas.

92. Taking a straight average of the values shown in a table can, in some situations, be misleading. For example, in a high-school class, there were only three different grades on the last test – 50, 70 and 90. The average of those marks is 70. But if we are told that there were ten students with a grade of 50, ten with 70 and one with 90, the weighted average is 61[25].

93. When we look at incomes that vary by age, we could calculate an average of those amounts – if there are 30 ages involved, we average 30 income amounts. That would give a reasonable answer if the judges or lawyers were evenly distributed across all 30 ages.

94. If we are looking at incomes of 500 people who are distributed across those 30 ages, a more appropriate result is to take an average of the incomes for the 500 people rather than an average of the 30 age groups. We could create a table with the 500 amounts and calculate that average. Or we can achieve the same result by calculating a weighted average. A weighted average is simply a mathematical shortcut to calculating the average for all 500 people[26].

95. In this report, the weighted average is not an average of the values shown in a table. It is based on taking those values in the table, determining for each of the many individuals the value that applies, and taking an average over all the individuals.

96. Most of the time in this report where I calculate a weighted average, it is an age-based weighted average.

97. For example, in Table 133, the rightmost column (Total Value of Pension and Disability Net of Judges' Contributions) shows a weighted average of 34.9%. If we take an average of the values shown in the table for each age, we get 42.1% (not shown in Table 133).

    a. The 42.1% would be reasonable to use if there are an equal number of judges appointed at each age 40 to 69.

    b. The 34.9% is appropriate to use to reflect the actual historical distribution of judges by age at appointment.

25 That weighted average can be verified by writing down all 21 marks – 10 students got 50, ten got 70 and one got 90. The average of those 21 marks is 61. Weighted average is a quicker way to achieve the same result without actually listing all 21 (or in many situations, significantly more) values.

26 At least, in this example, it is 500 people.

c. A different result might be appropriate to use if the future age of judicial appointments is expected to change significantly from past ages at appointment.

98. In this report, I have looked at averages based on the age of the judges upon their appointment to the bench as well as the geographic location of the judges just prior to their appointment. To perform those calculations, I was provided with a summary of the age of all appointments as a federal judge from 1 April 2011 to 31 March 2015 and from 1 April 2015 to 23 October 2020[27].

99. In total, there were 598 appointments during that 9.5-year period – 226 from 2011 to 2015 and 372 from 2015 to 2020.

100. I examined the distribution by age during each of the two periods as well as the entire 9.5 years and found there was very little difference.

a. The average age at appointment was 52.4 between 2011 and 2015 and it was 52.7 between 2015 and 2020. Over the entire period, the average age at appointment was 52.6.

b. When I calculated the weighted average value for the Judicial Annuity as a percent of compensation (a discussion of the Judicial Annuity begins at paragraph 112), I obtained 37.6%, 38.0% and 37.8% respectively for appointments during 2011 to 2015, 2015 to 2020 and over the entire period 2011 to 2020.

101. In my opinion, those differences are not material for the purposes of this report, and I have therefore only calculated weighted averages based on the distribution of federal judicial appointments over the entire 9.5-year period from 2011 to 2020.

[27] The Department of Justice provided me with statistics on judicial appointments from April 2011 to October 2020, made available by the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

E. Judicial Total Compensation

102. I understand that there are three main components to federal judicial total compensation[28] – salary, health and welfare benefits (often called group insurance benefits) and the Judicial Annuity, encompassing both permanent disability income protection and retirement income. There may be other items included and I have assumed that they are not material for the purposes of this report.

103. The nature of the judicial annuity is that the value varies significantly based on the age at appointment of a judge. Consequently, the total compensation for a federal judge will also differ among judges based on their age at appointment.

Salary

104. The salary for a federally appointed judge in 2020 was $338,800[29]. For ease of reference, I refer to the base salary ($338,800 for 2020 to 2021) as the Base Judicial Salary. I will refer to the total compensation for a judge who receives the Base Judicial Salary as the Base Judicial Total Compensation[30].

105. For this report, I will focus on the Base Judicial Salary and will ignore the effect of any supplemental amounts based on differing positions and geography.

106. Assuming that the increase in the IAI will be 6.74% in April 2021, the Base Judicial Salary will be increased to $361,600 as of 1 April 2021 – an increase of $22,800.

Retirement Savings

107. One component of compensation is retirement income accumulation. While many Canadians enjoy an employer-sponsored retirement plan, most Canadians are left to look after their personal retirement saving on their own, generally through contributing to a personal Registered Retirement Savings Plan ("RRSP").

28 "Guide for Candidates", Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, [www.fja-cmf.gc.ca/appointments-nominations/guideCandidates-eng.html]

29 Ibid. In addition, there are supplemental amounts chief justices, associate chief justices, justices of certain courts and northern allowances.

30 As discussed later (Paragraphs 141 to 142), the total compensation for judges varies by their age at appointment. I determine an average amount that reflects the age profile of judges upon appointment and use that – so Base Judicial Total Compensation refers to the average total compensation of all judges based on their ages at appointment.

108. There are many different types of retirement plans in Canada. Most retirement plans provided by an employer require part of the annual contribution to be paid by the employees and the balance by the employer. A few plans are funded entirely by the employer with no contribution required from employees. Where there is no retirement plan offered by the employer, the entire cost of retirement savings is borne by the individual employee.

109. For the vast majority, if not all, self-employed lawyers, retirement savings are funded entirely out of the individual's net income.

110. For federally appointed judges, the Judicial Annuity provides retirement income with the judges paying 7% of income each year until they are eligible for an unreduced annuity at which time, contributions decrease to 1% of income. Canada is responsible for the balance of the total cost.

111. To properly reflect retirement savings costs for self-employed lawyers and for federally appointed judges, we need to consider their differing opportunities, differing costs and differing values for retirement saving.

The Judicial Annuity

112. The Judicial Annuity provides excellent retirement benefits to retired judges. It is one of the best retirement plans in Canada.

    a. A lifetime annuity equal to ⅔rds of the final year's earnings provided the judge has met one of three thresholds involving age and judicial service[31]. A reduced lifetime annuity is available upon retirement prior to those thresholds.

    b. A lifetime annuity equal to ⅔rds of the final year's earnings upon permanent disability while serving as a federal judge with no minimum service requirement.

    c. A surviving spouse income payable following the death of a judge (both before and after retirement) equal to half of the amount payable to the judge.

    d. Inflation protection based on changes in the Consumer Price Index in each year while the annuity is payable.

[31] Attained age 75 and served at least ten years; Served at least 15 years and has a total of age plus service of at least 80; Served on the Supreme Court of Canada for a total of at least ten years.

113. In addition to retirement benefits, the Judicial Annuity provides permanent disability income should a judge become permanently disabled[32]. Within the private sector, if disability income protection is provided, it is usually done through long-term disability insurance which covers both temporary and permanent disabilities.

114. So, the Judicial Annuity is a combination of retirement savings and permanent disability income protection.

115. Judges must contribute part of the cost of the Judicial Annuity through payroll deductions equal to 7% of salary in each year until they are eligible to retire without a reduction to the amount of the annuity, following which the contribution is 1% of salary in each year. Canada is responsible for the balance of the total cost.

Retirement Income Requirements

116. The general rule used by financial planners for retirement income sufficiency has for many decades been 70% of pre-retirement income. For some people, 70% is not sufficient to maintain their lifestyle. For some people, 70% is more than sufficient.[33]

117. If we look at averages, the replacement percent decreases as pre-retirement income increases[34]. For example, a family earning $30,000 per annum prior to retirement is unlikely to be able to maintain their lifestyle on a 70% ($21,000) pension. A family earning $1 million annually is likely to have more than enough to maintain a lifestyle on a 70% ($700,000) pension. For most families, this is because of savings. The larger the income, generally the larger the amount saved each year. And in most situations, savings are no longer required following retirement.

118. Two other factors that affect retirement income needs are:

    a. whether one owns a home that has become mortgage-free in the last few years;

    b. the number of children and whether they have become financially independent[35].

119. Based on my experiences working with people planning for retirement, it is my opinion that a 70% pension is usually appropriate for families with a total income of $60,000 to $75,000. A higher percent is needed for lower income amounts and less for those with higher incomes.

120. Consequently, in my opinion, the vast majority of judges will have more income from the Judicial Annuity than is required to maintain their pre-retirement lifestyle.

121. While a judge may not require all of the income payable from the Judicial Annuity to maintain a lifestyle, the Judicial Annuity still delivers a full value to the judges. It provides them with an ability to support an increase in lifestyle if they should so wish, greater confidence in their financial future, as well as possibilities to provide larger inheritances and greater philanthropic activities.

Value of the Judicial Annuity

122. Within the pension industry, one generally expresses the value of retirement savings as a percent of salary (rather than as total dollars), thereby removing salary level as a factor for cost difference. In paragraph 128 below, I present the total dollar value of the Judicial Annuity for all years of service. For the rest of the report, I express the value of the Judicial Annuity as a percent of Base Judicial Salary.

123. Further, there are a number of ways to look at the value of a retirement pension. The two most common ways are:

a. Annual Value: the amount of funds required as a contribution in each year of service up to retirement, which can be expressed as either a dollar amount or a percent of earnings; and

b. Total Value: the total amount of funds required to pay for the total amount of retirement income earned as of the date of retirement.

124. There is no method that results in the same value for each person. At the time of retirement, the total value will vary by age of the judge, spousal status and gender. The annual value will vary by age of the judge, expected retirement age, expected spousal status at retirement, years of service as a judge and gender.

a. The younger a judge is when appointed to the bench, the more years there will be for the time value of money to discount the value from the future retirement age to the present, so the lower the annual value of the pension.

b. The younger a judge is at retirement, the greater will be the value of their pension since they will be retired for a longer time and receive greater total payments than if they retired at an older age.

c. If the judge has a spouse[36], the Judicial Annuity will be worth more than if there is no spouse because the annuity continues following the death of the judge as long as the spouse remains alive.

d. The value of a pension for a female is greater than for a male since females' life expectancy is greater than for males.

125. The value of a pension is based upon expectations at retirement as well as expectations prior to retirement (age at retirement, future compensation increases, etc.). While future events both before and after retirement will affect the final cost of a pension, the value is always based on expectations about what will happen in the future. While a 60-year-old retiree is expected to live more years than a 75-year-old retiree, that does not always happen.

126. Unless one is willing to wait for the cost of a Judicial Annuity to reveal itself once all retired judges have died, we must determine the value based on actuarial assumptions – expectations for the future.

What is Value?

I buy a 50/50 ticket for $10.00. With 1,000 tickets sold, the payout will be $5,000. My chance of winning the $5,000 is 1 in 1,000. My expected winnings are $5.00 – the $5,000 payout multiplied by my chance of winning it.

So, the value of that ticket to me is $5.00. After the draw is made, that ticket's value changes to either zero or $5,000. But prior to the draw, it always had a value of $5.00.

It is the same with pensions. The value is based on our expectations for the future, and that requires actuarial calculations and actuarial assumptions about future events.

The value may change over time as our expectations for the future change. But those changes do not change the past values since the past values were based on expectations at each past period of time.

127. I have focussed on the value for each year of service as a judge and have calculated the expected or average value each year from appointment to expected retirement based on a set of actuarial assumptions. Those assumptions are summarised in Appendix 4.

a. The assumptions recognise that judges retire at different ages and following different number of years of service. The probability of retirement for each age and service combination was taken from the Actuarial Report on the Pension Plan for Federally Appointed Judges as of 31 March 2019 (the most recent as of the date I made the calculations). Those assumptions were developed by the Chief Actuary based on past experience of when judges have retired.

[36] And/or children. There is a provision for continuation of the Judicial Annuity to any surviving dependent children. From my calculations, that provision has an immaterial effect on costs.

b. The retirement assumptions vary from age 55 (where ½ of 1% of judges are assumed to retire) to age 75 (where all judges who are still serving are assumed to retire).

c. Based on those assumptions, the average age of retirement varies from age 68 for a judge appointed at 40; to age 72 for a judge appointed at 50; and age 75 for a judge appointed at 60 and above.

d. Assumptions are also made for future interest (to recognise the time value of money), future salary increases, gender split of the judges, mortality rates, disability rates and probability of there being a survivor entitled to survivor benefits following the judge's death.

128. The dollar value of the Judicial Annuity is roughly similar regardless of the age at appointment. In the following, I calculated the weighted averages based on the number of judges appointed at each age from 40 to 69 over the past 9.5 years (April 2011 to October 2020)[37].

a. The total value for pension and disability benefits ranges from $1,775,000 to $2,172,000 for appointment at ages 40 to 65. The differences are mainly due to the time value of money. The weighted average over all ages is $1,885,000.

b. The total amount of contributions by a judge over their entire period of service varies from $187,000 to $356,000 for appointment at ages 40 to 65. The differences are mainly due of the length of time in service – the younger one is appointed, the more the total contributions will total. The weighted average over all ages is $280,000.

c. The total value of the pension and disability benefits, net of judges' contributions ranges from $1,447,000 to $1,984,000 for appointment at ages 40 to 65. Those differences are mainly due to the time value of money. The weighted average over all ages is $1,605,000.

129. The average age of retirement, based on the actuarial assumptions, is about 72. All judges are assumed to retire upon turning 75 or prior to that.

130. These total value amounts are not useful for determining total compensation nor are they useful for a comparison with retirement savings of self-employed lawyers and other professionals. For that, I have expressed the value of the Judicial Annuity as a percent of annual Base Judicial Salary – a percent that remains the same for each year of service as a judge.

[37] This averaging method is discussed further at paragraphs 91 to 101.

131. The value of the retirement income portion of the Judicial Annuity varies from 26.3% of Base Judicial Salary for a judge appointed at age 40 to 78.6% of Base Judicial Salary for a judge appointed at age 70. Assuming the judges' contributions are all utilised to fund the retirement income benefit, the value of the pension net of contributions ranges from 20.6% for a judge appointed at age 40 to 71.6% for a judge appointed at age 70.

132. The value of the disability income portion of the Judicial Annuity varies from 2.3% of earnings for a judge appointed at age 40 to 9.4% of earnings for a judge appointed at age 70. That assumes that no portion of the judge's contribution is used for disability income protection.

133. Table 133 sets out the annual value for the retirement income and permanent disability income based on each age at appointment from 40 to 70. Note that these percentages are an average over an entire career. As an example, for a judge appointed at age 50, the value net of judges' contributions for the pension and disability benefits would be 30.3% of Base Judicial Salary each year from appointment to retirement. The average cost to the judge would be 5.41% of Base Judicial Salary each year, which represents an average of the years with a 7% and a 1% contribution rate.

134. By looking at the ages of judicial appointments, we can calculate an age-weighted average overall value of the Judicial Annuity for all federally appointed judges. Net of judges' contributions, that is 37.8% of Base Judicial Salary.

Cost to a Lawyer to Replicate the Judicial Annuity

135. The value of the Judicial Annuity shown above is prior to considering the effects of income taxes. While the judge must contribute towards the cost of the Judicial Annuity, that contribution is tax deductible and the actual value is somewhat less than the actual contribution.

136. After retirement, the entire benefit paid by the Judicial Annuity is taxable in each year as it is paid.

137. For a self-employed lawyer to replicate the benefit of the Judicial Annuity (i.e., 66.7% of the lawyer's income) takes a combination of RRSP contributions and contributions to an investment plan. The tax impact on an RRSP is similar to the tax impact on the Judicial Annuity. But the effect of taxes on an investment plan are very different. Contributions are made with after-tax dollars; any investment income is immediately taxable and withdrawals from the plan are tax-free.

138. I have performed calculations of the total amount of income prior to taxes that a self-employed lawyer would need to use in order to replicate the pension benefits from the Judicial Annuity using a combination of RRSP and investment plan. In doing so, I recognised the differing income tax treatment for the different types of saving, the age at appointment to the judiciary and the average age of retirement of federal judges of age 72.

Total Value of the Judicial Annuity to a Self-Employed Lawyer

139. The value of the Judicial Annuity shown in Table 133 is prior to recognising that the income tax treatment afforded the Judicial Annuity is not available to individual Canadians, including the self-employed lawyers. Therefore, the value of the Judicial Annuity shown in Table 133 underestimates the actual value to the lawyer.

140. The cost to replicate the pension from the Judicial Annuity ranges from about 8% more for appointment at age 40 compared with the value of the Judicial Annuity to 18% more for appointment at age 65 compared with the value of the Judicial Annuity[38].

141. Table 141 shows the value of the Judicial Annuity based on age at appointment including the additional costs required to replicate the Judicial pension by a self-employed lawyer. This table builds on the results presented in Table 133 above.

58	41.84%	11.70%	53.54%

[38] The extra value varies up and down with age, but generally shows a gradually increasing pattern. The up and down fluctuations are mainly caused by changes in the assumed retirement age that starts at age 72 for appointments at age 40 and increases to retirement at age 75 for appointments at age 60 and above.

Weighted Average	37.84%	11.67%	49.51%

142. By looking at the ages of judicial appointments, we can calculate an age-weighted average value of the Judicial Annuity for all federally appointed judges including the effects of income tax. Net of judges' contributions, that is 49.51% of salary[39]. A self-employed lawyer would, on average, need to save 49.51% more of their net income than a judge in order to provide savings sufficient to provide the 2/3rds of earnings payable under the Judicial Annuity.

Health & Welfare Benefits

143. Judges receive health and welfare benefits similar to those provided to federal government employees[40]. The cost to the government for that is the total of the claims actually submitted and approved by the individual and their family members plus a small amount to cover claims adjudication and administrative expenses of the insurance company.

144. Self-employed lawyers may also have health and welfare benefits which may be more or less generous than those provided for the judges. The cost of these benefits can be deducted as a business expense in many situations and would therefore normally be paid prior to the determination of net income.

39 That 49.51% applies to all salary amounts. The dollar value is different between people with different salaries, but the percent is the same. That is similar to the benefit payable from the Judicial Annuity. The full amount is 66.7% of a judge's salary – which produces a different dollar amount between judges with different salaries, but the percent is the same.

40 "Guide for Candidates", Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, [www.fja-cmf.gc.ca/appointments-nominations/guideCandidates-eng.html]

145. While there may be some, or even many, self-employed lawyers who do not buy health and welfare benefits for themselves, I assume that those with net incomes above the median do have these benefits and that the cost is roughly similar as for a judge.

146. The cost of benefits typically forms part of total compensation. Since the costs are likely a wash in most situations, I have chosen to ignore it for purposes of this report.

Canada Pension Plan Contributions

147. There are at least two benefits with a different cost impact between self-employed lawyers and federally appointed judges: part of the Canada Pension Plan (CPP) contributions and retirement savings. Retirement savings are addressed above in paragraphs 135 to 142.

148. CPP contributions in 2021 total 10.9% of earnings between $3,500 and $61,600. Half is paid by the employee and half by the employer. For self-employed Canadians, the entire amount is paid by the self-employed person. For a person earning over $61,600 in 2021, the employee portion is $3,166 and the self-employed total contribution is $6,333. Those contributions are made out of net income. A judge therefore has $3,166 less in CPP contributions than the self-employed lawyer.

149. To properly reflect this difference in the CPP contributions, we could either reduce each of the net income amounts of self-employed lawyers shown in the tables in this report by the $3,166 difference or we could include the $3,166 as a benefit available to the judges as part of total compensation. In my opinion, it is easier to include this benefit as a part of the judges' total compensation since that involves adjusting only one amount.

Base Judicial Total Compensation

150. The Base Judicial Total Compensation is equal to the Base Judicial Salary plus an amount for Canada Pension Plan contributions plus the value for the Judicial Annuity plus the value of any other items or perquisites. I have assumed that the value of any other items or perquisites is not material and I have assigned a zero value to them for purposes of this report.

151. For a judge appointed at age 40, the Base Judicial Total Compensation in 2020 is $338,800 plus 39.7% (from table 141) for the Judicial Annuity plus $3,166 for CPP contributions giving a total of $476,500[41]. For a judge appointed at age 69, the Base Judicial Total Compensation is $666,400. Table 151 shows the Base Judicial Total Compensation by age for each year 2019 to 2021. Note that the 2021 amounts are based on my estimate assuming an increase to Base Judicial Salary for 2021 of 6.74% (paragraph 106). The age-weighted average is based on the actual ages of the judges appointed during the period 1 April 2011 to 23 October 2020.

[41] In this report, I round compensation amounts to the nearest $100.

Effect on Base Judicial Total Compensation

152. The Base Judicial Total Compensation shown in Table 151 is comprised of three items – Base Judicial Salary which is the same at each age, the value of the Judicial Annuity which varies by age at appointment and the portion of the judge's Canada Pension Plan contributions paid by Canada which is the same at each age. To determine a single value representative of all judges, I have calculated the "weighted average for age at appointment" of Base Judicial Total Compensation effective April 2019 to be $496,000.

153. The similar age-weighted average Base Judicial Total Compensation effective April 2020 is $509,400.

154. If the 2021 Base Judicial Salary increases as I estimated (paragraph 106) to 361,600, the age-weighted average Base Judicial Total Compensation effective April 2021 will be $543,800.

155. I have estimated at which percentile of net income for self-employed lawyers in all regions of Canada these judicial compensation amounts fall[42]. I took the 2019 net-income amounts for all self-employed lawyers in all regions of Canada and adjusted them to 2020 and to 2021 using an increase based on the average annual increases between 2015 to 2019. Those average increase percentages were determined separately for each of the percentile ranges[43].

156. I estimate that the average Base Judicial Total Compensation in 2019 of $496,000 is approximately at the 88th percentile of the self-employed lawyers in 2019[44].

157. I estimate that the average Base Judicial Total Compensation in 2020 of $509,400 is approximately at the 88th percentile of the self-employed lawyers in 2020[45].

42 The net incomes for self-employed lawyers in Canada are discussed in Section F and detailed tables of net-income are found in Section H.

43 That produced an annual increase in the self-employed lawyers' net income for 2020 and again for 2021 by percentile of:

65-70th percentile:	1.39%
70-75th percentile:	1.21%
75-80th percentile:	1.09%
80-85th percentile:	0.80%
85-90th percentile:	1.07%
90-95th percentile:	1.21%
95-100th percentile:	1.72%

44 If the self-employed lawyer's with net income below $60,000 are excluded, this is the 84th percentile of the approximately 70% of all self-employed lawyers who have net incomes greater than $60,000.

45 If the self-employed lawyer's with net income below $60,000 are excluded, this is the 84th percentile of the approximately 70% of all self-employed lawyers who have net incomes greater than $60,000.

158. I estimate that the average Base Judicial Total Compensation in 2021 of $543,800 will be approximately at the 89th percentile of the self-employed lawyers in 2021[46].

Effect on Total Compensation of Prothonotaries

159. For April 2019 to March 2020, the base salary of a prothonotary was $263,900, from April 2020 to March 2021 it is $271,000 and I estimate beginning April 2021 it will be $289,200 (80% of the Base Judicial Salary).

160. Using the same adjustments to obtain total compensation as used for puisne judges[47], I determined the total compensation of a prothonotary.

161. The 2019 average total compensation of a prothonotary is $397,300. That is about the 84th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

162. The 2020 average total compensation of a prothonotary is $408,100. That is about the 84th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

163. The 2021 average total compensation of a prothonotary is estimated to be $435,500. That is about the 86th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

46 If the self-employed lawyer's with net income below $60,000 are excluded, this is the 85th percentile of the approximately 70% of all self-employed lawyers who have net incomes greater than $60,000.

47 Take the base salary, add the value of the Judicial Annuity (based on the average value of 49.51%) and add the value of the government paying half of the Canada Pension plan contribution. This implicitly assumes that prothonotaries have a similar age profile at appointment as do the federally appointed judges.

F. Self-Employed Lawyers

164. About 2/3rds of the federal judicial appointees (2011 to 2020) are lawyers from private practice. That includes the self-employed lawyers as well as lawyers practicing in a corporation including professional corporations. Judges are also appointed from lawyers who are employed by organisations within the broader public sector. Canada Revenue Agency provided anonymous net income data for self-employed lawyers but was not able to provide sufficiently reliable employment information for lawyers working for a corporation or within the broader public sector. Consequently, I have utilised only self-employed lawyers as an income comparator.

165. A self-employed lawyer must cover all business expenses out of the gross income. The amount left over, or net income, is available to provide a personal income, retirement savings, and health and welfare benefits.

Percentiles

Percentiles help us easily rank a range of numbers, like compensation. When dealing with compensation, the 40th percentile refers to the compensation amount where 40% of all lawyers earn less and the rest (60%) earn more. The 75th percentile is the amount where 75% of lawyers earn less and the balance (25%) earn more.

The 50th percentile is also referred to as the median. Note that the median and the average are not the same. They are sometimes close in value, but they can also be very different – indicating the underlying data is skewed.

Consider the numbers 2, 3, 8, 15, 27. The average is 11. The median is 8 – the value that is in the middle – in this case where there are 2 values below it and two values above it.

Self-Employed Lawyers' Income

166. Canada Revenue Agency provided a data file of the net earnings of self-employed lawyers in Canada. I have analysed those and set out various analyses in section A.

167. Similar data has been provided and included in reports prepared for prior Quadrennial Commissions. I have provided results using similar analyses as was done in prior years. There is an issue with those analyses that I discuss later (see the call-out box on page 46). However, data that would have permitted me to address the issue was not available.

168. Compensation comparisons are a normal part of compensation reviews and are used mainly to determine how an organisation's total compensation amounts compare with similar organisations. It is normal to select other organisations that are in the same industry and similar sized organisations that compete for people with the same skills.

169. Once the data has been collected, one must determine what points in the range of salaries you want to utilise. If the evaluation is for employees with average skills and average performance, the focus would be on the average or the median compensation from the study. To pay an average performing employee compensation measured at the 75th percentile would be overpaying and could lead to wage inflation within that job sector. If the evaluation is for high performing employees, the focus would likely be on compensation at the 70th to 80th percentile – or even higher if the individual is a star performer. To pay average compensation to a high performing employee could lead to them quitting or a cessation of performing well.

170. In this section, I will focus on the compensation of self-employed lawyers[48]. Specifically, I use the net income of self-employed lawyers. Net income is equal to the total income from all services provided less business expenses, such as compensation for employees, office expenses, etc. Net income is basically the total compensation available to the self-employed lawyer.

171. There is a wide range of net income among lawyers and an individual lawyer's net income could fluctuate greatly from year to year. For example, in 2019 the average income reported by Canada Revenue Agency in metropolitan areas ranged from $7,530 to $1,037,000 ($8,800 to $1,223,000 in Toronto)[49]. What the data does not show is whether and by how much an individual lawyer's income fluctuates.

Salary Exclusion

172. Within the compensation industry, median is frequently used – but that depends on the type of candidate one wants to attract. This process may not completely translate to the relationship of lawyers and judges' compensation because income is not a perfect indicator of suitability for a judicial position.

173. Some of the data provided to prior Quadrennial Commissions has been based on income amounts that excluded net incomes below a threshold of $60,000 or $80,000. Excluding lower salaries is a very unusual method that results in distorted results. I am unable to determine a valid and appropriate reason for such an exclusion.

48 It would be better to also include compensation of lawyers who are employed by an organisation, but Canada Revenue Agency advised there are practical issues with being able to extract that data and ensure the accuracy of it.

49 Canada Revenue Agency use a modified percentile method of reporting net earnings. The lowest earnings reported (referred to as the "1st decile mean") is described as the average of the net income for lawyers who fall between the 5th percentile and 10th percentile. For clarity, there is no information provided on the bottom 5 percent of incomes, although those incomes are utilised in calculating some of the numbers.

The highest earnings reported (referred to as the "10th decile mean") is the average of the net income for the top 5% of lawyers – that is the average of incomes from the 95th percentile to the 100th percentile.

174. For example, by excluding those with a net income less than $60,000 for the 2019 data, one excludes about 34% of the self-employed lawyers in British Columbia, 30% in Alberta, 29.5% in Ontario, 39% in Quebec, and 29% in Atlantic Canada. There were not enough lawyers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and the three Territories to preserve confidentiality, and Canada Revenue Agency therefore suppressed almost all data. As a result, the effect of an income exclusion could not be determined for those five jurisdictions.

175. If we assume that income is one indicator of suitability for a federal judicial appointment, those percentages suggest that only 30% of the self-employed lawyers in Alberta, Ontario and Atlantic Canada are unsuitable while almost 40% of those in Quebec are unsuitable.

176. Based on my past experience of working with large amounts of data, it is my opinion that there are likely no or very few regional differences in the percentage of lawyers that possess specific qualities. That implies there are no or few regional differences in the percentage of lawyers that possess the specific qualities desired for a federal judicial appointment.

177. Normally, when looking at compensation data, we look at data in the range of where one wants to attract employees. In most industries, one looks for candidates from a similar position in other organisations. If you want to have a staff of average performers, you would tend to look to the median income. If you want above average performers, you will tend to look to the 60th to 70th percentiles. If you want outstanding performers, you will tend to look to the 70th and higher percentiles.

178. By excluding incomes below a threshold, the income amounts at each of the percentiles is simply increased while the number of people (or data points) is decreased. The median income becomes the income for above-average performers. The 75th percentile becomes the income for very outstanding performers.

179. Even if there is a valid reason to exclude low earnings, doing so leaves a perception that the exclusion is artificial and was done in order to obtain a pre-conceived result. If we know that we need to focus primarily on incomes of the top 25% of all lawyers in order to attract quality candidates, we look to the income statistics of those at the 75th and higher percentiles.

180. To exclude those with net incomes below $60,000 and then determine the percentiles results in inflating the incomes at each percentile. The top 25% of those earning more than $60,000 may be the top 20% of all lawyers (an even smaller percent in Quebec). To actually include the top 25% of all lawyers, we would need to adjust our sights to looks at roughly the top 30% (lower percent in Quebec) of all lawyers earning more than $60,000. That becomes a communication challenge when trying to explain to others why the top 25% of all lawyers includes those in the top 30%.

181. Since we can obtain the same end result without excluding any income, one needs to ask why an income exclusion was used. Say we end up selecting the income amount at the 80th percentile of the lawyers earning more than $60,000. That same result could be obtained by selecting the income amount at (approximately) the 85th percentile of all lawyers (no income exclusion).

182. If we exclude any data due to the amount of income, the results become inconsistent between geographic areas. If we make no exclusions, the data is consistent.

183. The report of the fifth Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission (the "2015 Quadrennial Commission") submitted 30 June 2016 addressed the issue of excluding salaries. They summarised the position of the Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association (the "Association") and the Canadian Judicial Council (the "Council") by stating "their rationale was that those who earn below a certain threshold are not suitable candidates for the judiciary: low income reflects a lack of success or time commitment incommensurate with the demands of a judicial appointment."

184. There are many reasons why an individual lawyer may have a low income, including issues around competence and commitment as suggested by the Association and Council. But there are also reasons, such as personal passions, practice areas and location, that could result in low income without implying unsuitability for a judicial appointment[50].

185. I also note that due to the variabilities of net income, it is likely that many lawyers will fluctuate between net incomes that are above and below a low-income threshold.

186. If we accept the position of the Association and Council that it is reasonable to exclude low net incomes from the compensation comparators, we should also consider an exclusion of high net incomes. In many situations, high income more likely implies business success (as opposed to legal acumen), a willingness to hustle to obtain clients and a focus on financial rewards rather than implying qualities commensurate with a judicial appointment. Excluding low net-income as well as high net-income does not mean that those lawyers are necessarily unsuitable for appointment, but rather that the likelihood of their having suitable characteristics is less than for the non-excluded lawyers.

50 "Guide for Candidates", Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs. In describing the assessment process and considerations, there is no mention made of the salary of an applicant. Reference is made to "professional competence and experience, personal characteristics, and potential impediments to appointment."

187. If it is appropriate to exclude those with lower compensation, it is my opinion that there should also be a high-compensation exclusion. I suggest that excluding lawyers with net compensation above about $650,000 would be appropriate[51] – but only if there is also a low-compensation exclusion. I suggest that excluding net compensation below $60,000 would be appropriate – but only if there is also a high-compensation exclusion. (In my opinion is there should be no income exclusion at either the top or bottom of the income range. But if there is to be an income exclusion, it should be at both the top and bottom.)

188. Unfortunately, the format of the data from the Canada Revenue Agency does not permit an accurate calculation of the effect of including a high-income exclusion but it does permit an estimated calculation. I have estimated the effect of using both a low and high-income exclusion in Table 188.

Table 188 - Percentile Levels for Compensation with Various Exclusions

Age Range	Compensation Excluded	65-70th percentile	75-80th percentile	85-90th percentile	95-100th percentile
35 - 69	None	203,280	274,950	413,900	937,480
	Below $60,000	277,970	363,080	525,260	1,085,320
	Below $80,000	302,780	394,430	560,130	1,132,330
	Below $60,000 & Above $650,000	241,000	297,000	384,000	559,000
35 - 46	None	217,340	273,400	376,690	741,350
	Below $60,000	266,490	326,230	448,060	824,300
	Below $80,000	282,960	346,420	472,330	851,820
	Below $60,000 & Above $650,000	247,000	295,000	378,000	570,000

51 I selected $650,000 after examining the percentiles for net income. For the Other Regions (all of Canada except the 10 largest census metropolitan areas or CMAs), all the percentile points are less than $650,000. That does not mean there is no one earning over $650,000 outside the 10 CMAs, but that if there are such people, they are most likely less than 2.5% of all lawyers outside those 10 CMAs.

For the largest CMAs other than Calgary and Toronto, the income situation is similar to Other Regions except that there could be between 2.5% and 7.5% of all lawyers who earn more than $650,000. For Calgary and Toronto, this would result in excluding about 10% to 15% of all lawyers in those cities.

Other thresholds could be equally valid. At income levels over $650,000, the amount of income between percentiles gets wider and wider. There is less and less congestion around a specific income amount as the amount of net income increases. For example, if the exclusion was set at $750,000, it would have a small impact on the number of lawyers excluded compared with the $650,000 I have used.

Age Range	Compensation Excluded	65-70th percentile	75-80th percentile	85-90th percentile	95-100th percentile
47 - 54	None	261,160	367,380	578,250	1,189,810
	Below $60,000	346,400	477,690	691,970	1,322,200
	Below $80,000	378,350	518,960	727,040	1,368,460
	Below $60,000 & Above $650,000	273,000	335,000	445,000	606,000
55 - 69	None	166,900	237,100	375,100	925,020
	Below $60,000	257,870	346,740	507,170	1,124,970
	Below $80,000	287,580	383,760	546,940	1,185,670

189. By excluding only compensation at the low end, all percentile amounts are increased significantly. By excluding compensation at both the upper and lower end, the income amounts are increased at percentiles up to 80th (with the exception of ages 47 to 54) and the income amounts decrease at percentiles above the 80th.

190. When looking for comparators (whether for compensation or for other items), excluding any data is only appropriate if there are some obvious outliers that will distort the results if they are included. Given the large amount of data provided by Canada Revenue Agency, the effect of including an outlier with extremely large or small income would be immaterial for the purposes of this report.

191. If there is one lawyer in the data with a net income of $25 million, I have estimated there would be no change to any of the percentile amounts (except the 100th) and the 2019 average net income of all lawyers would be increased by $1,600. Because the sample size is smaller, the effect on the average net income for lawyers aged 47 to 54 would be about $7,600 increase if the outlier lawyer was aged between 47 and 54 – an amount that is unlikely to affect the results of the income relationships in this report[52].

192. While the 2015 Quadrennial Commission neither endorsed nor rejected the method of salary exclusions, they did find that there was no basis to apply an $80,000 threshold for such an exclusion.

193. In my opinion, excluding any compensation amounts distorts the results and creates a perception of possible manipulation.

[52] For the other age groups, the dollar effect would be less.

194. In the submission of the Association and Council, to the 2015 Quadrennial Commission, they utilised the average earnings of self-employed lawyers based on the ages between 44 and 56. That is the age range at which the majority of judges are appointed. But there have been judges appointed at ages below 44 and above 56. To exclude them from the analysis amounts to age exclusion – similar to earnings exclusion.

195. If we look at the net earnings data for self-employed lawyers (Table 256a), we can see that the ages with the lowest earnings are 35 to 43 and 56 to 69[53].

196. Calculating an average income amount by looking only at ages 44 to 56 is the same as excluding lawyers with low earnings – it is similar to a belief that younger and older lawyers are irrelevant for the purposes of reviewing judicial compensation.

197. It is true that relatively fewer lawyers (30% of appointments between 2011 and 2020) are appointed at ages outside the range 44 to 56 compared to those who are within that range (70% of appointments between 2011 and 2020). One way to reflect the smaller number of judges appointed at younger and older ages is to calculate a weighted average that is based on the relative number of judges appointed at each age. Because the younger and older appointees are relatively fewer, including them in the weighted average has a smaller effect on the average than those aged 44 to 56. But including them recognises that they exist and do get appointed.

198. Unless it can be shown that the data includes only a few outliers that will distort the results, there is no valid reason to exclude any data when calculating an average for a group.

199. For example, we can compare the net incomes of all self-employed lawyers as provided by the Canada Revenue Agency (ages 35 to 69) with the net incomes of self-employed lawyers aged 44 to 56 and with the average net incomes of all lawyers weighted to reflect the distribution of ages at appointment. For this I use the 2019 net income amounts for all lawyers in all regions of Canada.

Table 209 – Effect of Age Exclusion – 2019 Net Earnings

Ages	65-70th percentile	75-80th percentile	85-90th percentile	95-100th percentile	Average
35 - 69	203,280	274,950	413,900	937,480	224,140
Age weighted	230,840	321,080	499,160	1,065,810	259,270
44 - 56	251,630	349,530	539,060	1,124,160	277,930

53 However, for regions other than the top ten CMAs, income remains high through to age 59 and then drops off at ages 60 to 69.

200. Table 209 shows the effect of excluding the younger and older ages at appointment – at the 75th percentile, the net income of all lawyers in 2019 was $270,000, but by excluding the younger and older lawyers, it is boosted to $340,000 – an increase of 26%.

201. Instead of using the average net income of all self-employed lawyers, we could calculate a weighted average that reflects the age distribution of judges at their appointment. This method gives greater weight to the incomes at ages where more judges are appointed and less weight to the ages where fewer judges get appointed. The net income in 2019 weighted by age at appointment was $320,000 (79th percentile), but by excluding the younger and older lawyers, it is boosted to $350,000 (81st percentile) – an increase of 9%.

202. For the balance of the body of this report, I will look at net income amounts with no exclusions – either for age or income. For the sake of completeness, the data included in Section H does include compensation exclusions of incomes below both $60,000 and $80,000. Because of the significant amount of work required to add an exclusion at the high end of incomes, I have not made any calculations with a high-income exclusion other than those shown in Table 188.

Self-Employed Lawyers' Income Comparators

203. Table 205 shows the percentile net income amounts by age groupings and by calendar year 2015 to 2019. Ages 35 to 69 covers all of the lawyers within the data from Canada Revenue Agency. The next three age groups (35–46, 47–54, 55–69) follow the lawyers as they move through their careers. The last grouping (44 to 56) was used by the Association and Council in past years to be representative of the ages at which most new judicial appointments are made.

204. Net income fluctuates up and down from year to year, but generally with an upward trend.

205. In general, compensation increases with age and peaks somewhere between ages 47 and 54. Compensation then declines as lawyers approach retirement.

How can percentiles mislead us?

1. It is important to note that these percentile numbers do not necessarily reflect the income levels of individual lawyers over a period of years. As a simplified example of this, consider a group of 100 lawyers. Each lawyer in the group normally has net income of $200,000 give or take $20,000 each year. Some lawyers are down, and some are up each year. The median net income is $200,000, the 90th percentile is $216,000 and the 100th percentile is $220,000.
2. However, in each year, five of those lawyers have a windfall year with a net income of $400,000. No lawyer has more than one windfall year in each decade. The statistics will still show a median income of about $200,000 and a 90th percentile of about $216,000, but the 100th percentile is $400,000.
3. Each year, the statistics will show the same result. The statistics will, at first glance, suggest that there are a few lawyers who have a net income of $400,000 consistently in each year with the rest having income between $180,000 and $220,000. And yet based on the scenario I laid out, there is no one who regularly makes more than $220,000.
4. In this example, if we focus on the $400,000 data point for a decision about individual incomes of high achievers, we will be led astray. Even if we focus on the 90th percentile and use the $216,000 net income amount, we will miss the approximately one year in ten with a huge income increase. That one year in ten amount would raise the average annual net income for the 90th percentile group from $216,000 to $236,000.
5. What we do not know from the data provided by Canada Revenue Agency is how much variability there is in year-to-year incomes of individuals nor the frequency and effect of any windfall years. With the large sample size used by Canada Revenue Agency, it is unlikely that the data would be as misleading as the above example, but there could be issues hidden within the data that we are not able to identify. For example, if we rank lawyers based on average net income over five or ten years, are the decile breaks lower, higher or approximately the same? How many lawyers have windfall years; how often does that occur and what is the effect on the income statistics?
6. In my opinion, if this issue affects the self-employed lawyers' income amounts, it will primarily do so at the upper and lower percentiles. It is possible that the income amounts at the upper percentiles may be significantly overstated and the amounts at the lower percentiles understated.
7. For that reason, I requested data on a sample set of individuals showing their net income over a ten-year period on an individual basis – either as a dollar amount or as a percentage of their 2010 income. The goal was to understand how income fluctuates and how it can affect the percentile rankings of all self-employed lawyers. Canada Revenue Agency advised they are unable to ensure confidentiality of individuals if data was provided in that format and consequently, they are not permitted to release that information.

206. The net-income data was provided based on a number of age groupings. That allows us to look at how net income changes as one ages and presumably gains experience and reputation.

207. Overall, self-employed lawyers have seen their income increase roughly in line with the IAI over the four-year period 2015 to 2019 (the most recent data available from Canada Revenue Agency). This is based on data for lawyers aged 35 to 69 in all areas of Canada without any income exclusion.

Table 207 - Increase in Net Income of Self-Employed Lawyers - 2015 to 2019

Grouping	Total Increase over 4-Years	Average Annual Increase
45 to 50th percentile	6.6%	1.6%
55 to 60th percentile	8.2%	2.0%
65 to 70th percentile	7.8%	1.9%
75 to 80th percentile	5.9%	1.4%
85 to 90th percentile	4.9%	1.2%
95 to 100th percentile	8.0%	1.9%
Average net income	6.5%	1.6%
Average of 65 to 100th percentile	6.9%	1.7%
IAI Change	7.0%	1.7%

208. While some of the net income brackets experienced increases in the 2015 to 2019 period greater than the IAI and other brackets less than the IAI, the average over all net income levels (6.5%) as well as the average over the 65th to 100th percentiles (6.9%)[54] were similar to the four-year total IAI increase (7.0%).

209. In my opinion, over the most recent four-year period for which we have data (2015 to 2019), the increase in the IAI has been approximately the same as the increase in net income of self-employed lawyers.

210. Based on that, we can state that the relationship between self-employed lawyers' net income and Base Judicial Total Compensation of judges has remained unchanged.

211. While we do not know how much self-employed lawyers net incomes changed in 2020, in my opinion, it is highly unlikely that they increased as much as the IAI. Therefore, I conclude that the Base Judicial Salary will likely increase more in April 2021 than will self-employed lawyers' net income.

Self-Employed Lawyers and Retirement Savings

212. For self-employed Canadians, saving for retirement involves making contributions to an RRSP and once the maximum contribution is reached, contributing to a non-registered investment account. RRSPs have income tax advantages that make them more efficient for retirement savings than other options.

213. It is important to recognise that the Judicial Annuity provides a retirement income that exceeds the maximum tax-assisted pension permitted under the Income Tax Act for the private sector. The same retirement income savings are available within the private sector, but the majority of that amount must be funded without the tax-sheltering of registered pension plans and RRSPs. Consequently, the cost of having equivalent savings is higher than the value of the Judicial Annuity.

214. If a Canadian wants to enjoy a retirement lifestyle more expensive than can be provided out of government benefits (CPP and Old Age Security), they will need to save. I have assumed that all judges and all self-employed lawyers with incomes above the median want more income than provided by government benefits. The Judicial Annuity serves that purpose for judges and so they most likely do not need to save any additional monies for retirement beyond their contributions towards the Judicial Annuity. Any savings for retirement by a self-employed lawyer will come out of net income because the Income Tax Act does not permit the self-employed to have a retirement savings plan where contributions are permitted as a business expense.

215. Table 141 shows the value of replicating the Judicial Annuity for a self-employed lawyer. To maintain consistency in any review of income relationships[55], we can either reduce the self-employed lawyers' net income by the required amount for retirement saving and compare that to the Base Judicial Salary, or we can use the total amount of the self-employed net income and compare that with the Base Judicial Total Compensation which includes the value of the Judicial Annuity is fully reflected. Either basis is comparing like with like. I have chosen the latter as it involves fewer calculations.

[55] That is, to ensure we are looking at "apples and apples" and have not included any oranges in the review.

G. Deputy Ministers Within the Federal Government

216. Past Quadrennial Commissions have reviewed the compensation of deputy ministers in relation to the compensation of federally appointed judges.

217. Like judges, deputy ministers receive both health and welfare benefits and pension benefits in addition to their salary. They both are required to make contributions towards the pension. CPP contributions are the same – the government pays half and the employee pays the other half. There are two significant differences – performance pay and the value of the pension[56].

218. Deputy ministers are eligible for performance pay in addition to their base salary. That has been reflected in the tables in this section.

219. The pension arrangements for deputy ministers differs from that for federally appointed judges. To obtain a similar pension income, a deputy minister needs to work within the public service for about 35 years and to contribute to the Public Service Superannuation Plan for those years. That likely includes many years of service prior to being appointed as a deputy minister.

220. The contribution rates are slightly greater than the 7% of base compensation for the judges – 9.83% on the first $61,600 of income and 12.26% on the balance[57]. For a deputy minister earning $300,000 per annum, that is a contribution of about 11.75% of base compensation, or about 4.75% more than a judge is required to contribute.

221. I estimate that the annual value of the pension for a deputy minister, net of contributions, is roughly 17.0% of a deputy minister's base compensation[58].

56 There is also a difference in contributions to the pension plan, but that will be included as part of the pension plan difference.

57 Lower contribution rates apply to those hired after 2012, but the provisions of the pension are less generous for retirement prior to age 65.

58 A Deputy Minister requires about 35 years of federal government service to earn a pension equivalent to a judicial pension. The average tenure of a judge, based on the assumptions used in the valuation of the judicial annuity, is 20.7 years. The average value of the judicial annuity for appointments between ages 40 and 65 is 36.7% of base compensation. Adjusting that 36.7% for the differences in tenure and then subtracting 4.75% to reflect the higher contributions required of a deputy minister results in an estimated value for a deputy minister's pension of 17.0% of compensation. A small additional adjustment should be made to reflect the differences in income tax treatment between the pension plan and retirement savings available to self-employed lawyers. I have ignored that adjustment.

222. To be able to make a valid and fair comparison of earnings, we need to use the total compensation of a deputy minister. In particular, there is a large difference between the value of a judge's pension and the value of a deputy minister's pension. To calculate the total compensation of a deputy minister so that the relationship with Base Judicial Total Compensation is a fair and proper one, we should gross-up the deputy ministerial compensation by 17.0%.

Deputy Minister Compensation

223. I was provided with a history of compensation for deputy ministers. There are four levels of deputy minister – DM-1, DM-2, DM-3, and DM-4.

224. The compensation information set out the salary range for each year (April to March), the average base compensation and average amount of at-risk pay. I was also provided with the maximum amount that could be payable as at-risk pay, expressed as a percentage of base compensation. The amount of at-risk pay varies by individual and is awarded at year-end based on the individual's performance.

Block Comparator

225. The 2015 Quadrennial Commission discussed[59] using compensation of deputy ministers at the DM-3 level, and their year-over-year increases as a reference for judicial compensation (the "Block Comparator"). The Block Comparator in each year is the mid-point of the DM-3 base salary range plus half of the total at-risk pay[60].

226. The 2015 Quadrennial Commission commented on a proposal from the Association and Council that the Block Comparator be changed to equal the total average compensation of DM-3s[61]. The number of DM-3s is small and average compensation can vary considerably based on the composition of the deputy ministers. They concluded that using average pay of DM-3s would not "provide a consistent reflection of year over year changes in compensation." I agree.

59 "Report and Recommendations Submitted to the Minister of Justice of Canada" by the Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission, 30 June 2016, paragraphs 45-56.

60 Total at-risk pay is the maximum amount that a deputy minister can earn based upon performance. The amount of at -risk pay actually paid will vary from year to year and from person to person.

61 "Report and Recommendations Submitted to the Minister of Justice of Canada" by the Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission, 30 June 2016, paragraph 49 - 51.

227. The Block Comparator is based on only two of the components of total compensation – salary and at-risk pay (see paragraphs 31 to 34). It ignores the pension plan and other forms of compensation available to deputy ministers. In essence, it assumes the value of a deputy minister's pension plan is equivalent to the value of the Judicial Annuity. Consequently, in my opinion, the Block Comparator should be used with care and recognition should be made either directly or indirectly to the large difference in value of the two pension plans.

228. In this section, I first review the total compensation of deputy ministers and of senior government agency appointments over the past five years and then I calculate the Block Comparator.

Total Compensation for Deputy Ministers.

229. The amount of at-risk pay shown in the tables below is the average amount paid to all deputy ministers at each level and is likely different by individual. The at-risk pay for the year beginning 2020 was not available as of the date of this report and so I have estimated it to be the same percentage of mid-point salary as in 2019 (shown in red). The total compensation includes the value of the pension net of contributions (paragraph 221).

230. I note the salary ranges have not changed in the last four years, but the deputy ministers' base compensation has increased, likely as a result of their progressing through the salary grids. With the possible exception of DM-4[62], base compensation is nearing the top-end of the salary range and it is likely that at least some of the deputy ministers have not received an increase in compensation in the past few years.

[62] The possible exception of DM-4 is because there is not enough data disclosed to be able to make a finding on this issue.

* The average basic compensation and the at-risk pay was not provided for DM-4 due to the small number of incumbents and confidentiality issues. The amounts shown in Table 230d are estimated by me. I calculated the average ratio of the average basic compensation to the mid-point salary for DM-1, DM-2 and DM-3 over the period 2015 to 2019. I assumed that average would apply at DM-4 (shown in red). I examined the at-risk pay as a percent of average basic compensation for DM-1, DM-2 and DM-3 and assumed the actual amount paid at DM-4 would have been 33% (shown in red). Consequently, the total compensation for DM-4 is based on assumptions that I made and does not necessarily reflect the actual amounts.

Government Agency Appointments Compensation

231. I was provided with compensation information for positions within government agencies and similar organisations with a job classification of GC-09, GC-10, GCQ-09 and GCQ- 10. In each of these classifications, there are between 1 and 5 individuals and for confidentiality purposes, average salary was not provided. I note that as with the DM compensation grids, these grids have been frozen since 2017. It is therefore likely that the incumbents are close to if not at the upper end of their grid as with the deputy ministers. I have therefore assumed that the average basic compensation in each year 2015 to 2020 for GC and GCQ positions is the same as I assumed for DM-4 positions -- 105.5% of the mid-point salary in each year (shown in red).

232. The specifics of the pension plan available to each of these positions may vary from the Public Sector Pension Plan. I have assumed that any variance is not material and have applied the same value for the pension as I used for deputy ministers – 17.0%

233. I was informed by the Department of Justice that these two GC positions are eligible for at-risk pay, but the GCQ positions are not eligible.

234. I determined that the Base Judicial Total Compensation beginning April 2020 is $509,400 (paragraph 153). That is 113% of the Total Compensation of a DM-3 and 98% of the estimated Total Compensation of a DM-4.

235. I determined that the Base Judicial Total Compensation beginning April 2021 will be approximately $543,800 (paragraph 154). Assuming there are no increases effective April 2021 for deputy ministers, that is 121% of the Total Compensation of a DM-3 and 104% of the estimated Total Compensation of a DM-4.

The Block Comparator

236. In this section, I determine the amount of the Block Comparator (see paragraphs 225 to 228) for 2015 to 2020 in relation to the Base Judicial Salary.

Table 236 – Block Comparator and Base Judicial Salary

Year Beginning 1 April	Mid-point of Salary range for DM-3	50% of At-Risk Pay	Block Comparator	Base Judicial Salary	Percent of Block Comparator
2015	273,800	45,180	318,980	308,600	96.7%
2016	280,000	46,200	326,200	314,100	96.3%
2017	283,550	46,790	330,340	315,300	95.4%
2018	283,550	46,790	330,340	321,600	97.4%
2019	283,550	46,790	330,340	329,900	99.9%
2020	283,550	46,790	330,340	338,800	102.6%

237. In 2016 and 2017, the Block Comparator increased more than did Base Judicial Salary – 3.6% over the two years compared with IAI increases of 2.2% over the same two years. That is the smallest increase in the IAI over any two-year period since the IAI was introduced in 2005 as the automatic driver of judicial salary increases.

238. DM-3 salary ranges were frozen for 2018, and no increases have been given to DM-3s since April 2017 other than for progression through the salary range. Since 2017, the Base Judicial Salary has increased a total of 7.5% with no increase to the Block Comparator.

239. As discussed in paragraph 227, the Block Comparator ignores the unequal value of the pension arrangements for judges and deputy ministers. The value of the Judicial Annuity is about 32.5% more as a percent of salary than the value of the deputy minister's pension. One way to address that is to adjust the Block Comparator to reflect the value of a deputy minister's pension and the portion of the CPP contributions paid by the government[63] – which gives a comparator equivalent to the expected total compensation of a DM-3. That gives a like-for-like relationship between the Block Comparator and Base Judicial Total Compensation.

Table 239 – Adjusted Block Comparator and Base Judicial Total Compensation

Year Beginning 1 April	Block Comparator	Adjusted Block Comparator*	Base Judicial Total Compensation	Percent of Adjusted Block Comparator
2015	318,980	375,543	463,867	123.5%
2016	326,200	384,052	472,154	122.9%
2017	330,340	388,913	473,968	121.9%
2018	330,340	388,943	483,417	124.3%
2019	330,340	389,098	495,981	127.5%
2020	330,340	389,247	509,437	130.9%

* Block Comparator plus value of DM Pension and CPP Value

63 The amount of the CPP contributions paid by the government varies from year to year as the total CPP contribution amount changes. The Adjusted Block Comparator shown here reflects that changing value - $2,480 in 2015 increasing annually to $2,898 in 2020. (The 2021 amount, which is used elsewhere in this report for the 2021 Base Judicial Total Compensation is $3,166).

Deputy Minister Tenure

240. I was provided with details of past deputy ministers setting out their positions, initial appointment as a deputy minister and the date they left the ranks of deputy minister. From that, I calculated the time served as a deputy minister and the average tenure of deputy ministers. The data included 107 people whose term ended at either a DM-3 or DM-4 level. Two of those were acting deputy minister and had a term of less than one month, and I have excluded them. That leaves 105 with terms of more than one month.

241. The tenures for deputy ministers who were DM-3 or DM-4 at the end of their service ranged from five months to 20.7 years. The average tenure of those 105 deputy ministers was 8.75 years.

242. The average tenure of these deputy ministers is significantly shorter than the average expected tenure of a judge. Based on the assumptions used in valuing the Judicial Annuity, the average tenure of a federally appointed judge is 20.3 years – over twice the length of a deputy minister who reached a DM-3 or DM-4 level.

243. In my opinion, there are three possible reasons for this differential in tenure.

a. Deputy ministers retire much earlier than judges. Under the Public Service Superannuation Act, most government employees retire at or prior to age 65. For long-term employees, there is little or no incentive to remain working beyond age 65. Based on the assumptions used in valuing the Judicial Annuity, the average expected retirement age for judges is about age 72. Retirement could account for between 7 and 12-years differential in tenure.

b. Deputy ministers serve at the pleasure of the government and could be terminated at any time. The job security of a deputy minister may not be as high as it is with judges.

c. Deputy ministers may be subject to more stress and/or different stressors and may be unable to function at the high level demanded of their position for as long as a judge.

244. I am not able to offer an opinion as to whether and to what extent this differential in tenure should or could be reflected in any relationship between total compensation of deputy ministers and Judicial Total Compensation.

H. Data Tables Utilised in the Report

245. As was done for prior Quadrennial Commissions, Canada Revenue Agency provided a number of files with data on the past net income of self-employed lawyers in Canada. The data provided was already grouped by age brackets, census metropolitan areas ("CMAs") and provinces. If there are not enough lawyers within a grouping to preserve confidentiality, then no income amount was provided.

Number of Self-Employed Lawyers

246. The total number of self-employed lawyers for whom net income data was provided decreased from 2015 to 2020. This continued the trend seen in prior years. I obtained the number of self-employed lawyers for the 2010 to 2014 period from the Report on the Earnings of Self-Employed Lawyers for the Department of Justice Canada in Preparation for the 2015 Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission by Mr. Haripaul Pannu, dated 25 February 2016.

Table 246 – Total Number of Self-Employed Lawyers – 2010 to 2019[64]

Year	Number of Self-Employed Lawyers
2010	22,110
2011	19,310
2012	19,190
2013	19,360
2014	18,550
2015	18,740
2016	18,330
2017	17,270
2018	17,640
2019	15,510
Average	18,600

247. The most likely reason for this decrease in numbers is a gradual process of self-employed lawyers converting their practice to a professional corporation. The number of self-employed lawyers could also be affected by a shift in the age of such lawyers – reducing the numbers between 35 and 69. In my opinion, that is likely to have a much smaller effect than the conversion of practices.

64 These are the total number of self-employed lawyers in Canada for whom Canada Revenue Agency provided data in each year. Only lawyers between ages 35 and 69 were included. There were some within that age range that were excluded for data reasons.

248. Canada Revenue Agency advise that they are not able to provide accurate income amounts from a professional corporation. The reporting of income from the provision of legal services is not separated from other types of income provided on income tax returns and so any information could be misleading. That is much less likely to happen with net income from the self-employed.

Data Presentation

249. There are many ways the data can be presented and reviewed. In the tables that follow in this section, I have presented the data in several ways that in my opinion provide differing ways to consider the relationships. With the exception of the first three groups of tables (Tables 253a to 255c), I have only shown the 65-70th and higher percentile ranges along with the median income and 75th percentile.

250. Definitions:

a. Median: the net income amount where half of all lawyers make less and half make more.

b. Average or Mean: the income amount that is the average of all the net incomes for all lawyers in the group. If the average is greater than the median, it indicates that the net incomes are skewed towards the high end – that is, there are some lawyers with very high net incomes relative to the entire group.

c. Percentile: A system of ranking data from the smallest to the largest. For income ranking, the 65th percentile is the amount where 65% of all self-employed lawyers make less and 35% make more. Refer also to the call-out box on page 37.

d. Percentile range: In the data from Canada Revenue Agency, the actual percentiles were not provided, but instead the average income amount for the five percentiles below the indicated percentile was given. For example, the 75th percentile is the average of the net incomes for all lawyers with incomes between the 70th and 75th percentiles. The 100th percentile is the average of the net incomes of the top five percent of self-employed lawyers. Where I refer to the percentile data provided by Canada Revenue Agency, I show the range, such as 70-75th percentile. We can estimate with sufficiently high accuracy the actual single-point percentile represented by a range of percentiles is the mid-point. For example, the range 70-75th percentile is the 72.5th percentile[65].

e. All Ages: The data provided includes self-employed lawyers aged 35 to 69. So a reference to "All Ages" should be considered as ages 35 to 69.

f. CMAs: The lawyers were grouped within the ten largest Census Metropolitan Areas (CMAs) – in order of decreasing size, Toronto, Montréal, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Québec City and combined into one group for confidentiality purposes, Hamilton and the Kitchener, Cambridge, Waterloo areas). All other regions of Canada were combined and are referenced as "Other Regions").

251. Canada Revenue Agency rounded all income amounts to the nearest $10 with the exception of the median and the 75th percentiles which were rounded to the nearest $10,000. The data contains a couple of apparent anomalies that are the result of the different rounding[66]. In my opinion, those anomalies are not material for the purposes of this report, and I have not drawn attention to them elsewhere.

252. While it is my opinion that income exclusions should have no place in a compensation comparison, I have included tables based on an income exclusion since that data was provided by Canada Revenue Agency and may have been utilised by prior Quadrennial Commissions in their deliberations.

65 This works well up to the 75th percentile. From the 75th to 90th percentile, it gives a result that is approximately equal to the correct value and above the 90th percentile, it will give a result that is low.

66 For example, the 70-75th percentile is slightly greater than the 75th percentile. If rounding were done consistently, the 70-75th percentile should never be larger than the 75th percentile.

Net Incomes for All Regions and All Ages 2015 to 2019

253. The following three tables present information for all of the self-employed lawyers in Canada over the period 2015 to 2019 based on (a) no income exclusion and (b) excluding those with net incomes less than $60,000 and (c) excluding those with net incomes less than $80,000.

Comparison of Net Incomes by Age

256. The Canada Revenue Agency provided net income amounts by age groupings for each year 2015 to 2019. To reduce the amount of data included herein, I show only the data for 2019. I have examined the other years and while the income progressions differ somewhat, they do follow the same pattern of increasing as one ages from 35 to about 50 and then gradually falling off by age 69.

Comparison of Net Incomes by Census Metropolitan Area

257. The Canada Revenue Agency provided net income amounts by CMA for each year 2015 to 2019. To reduce the amount of data included herein, I show only the data for 2019. I have examined the other years and while the income relationships differ somewhat, they do follow roughly the same pattern of increasing and decreasing from year to year.

Comparison of Net Incomes by Province

258. Canada Revenue Agency provided net income amounts by provinces and territories for each year 2015 to 2019. However, for Saskatchewan, Manitoba and the three territories, almost all of the data was suppressed due to confidentiality issues. To reduce the amount of data included herein, I show only the data for 2019. I have examined the other years and while the income relationships differ somewhat, they do follow roughly the same pattern of increasing and decreasing from year to year with the exception of Alberta. I have included a table that shows the data for all years for Alberta.

259. Since the year-to-year net income amounts for Alberta fluctuated significantly and differently from the other provinces, but only at the 60th percentile and above, I have included the data for Alberta and for all other provinces in the two tables below. In 2016, the net incomes for those at the 60th percentile and above in Alberta decreased by between 14% and 40% from the 2015 amounts. For all other provinces, there was a small increase except in Ontario where there was a small decrease.

Recent Appointments to Federal Judiciary

260. The Department of Justice provided me with a summary of the number of appointments to the federal judiciary. The data covered the period 1 April 2011 to 31 March 2015 and from 1 April 2015 to 23 October 2020. In total, that data covers about 9.5 years of appointments.

261. The first such table is age at appointment. The average age of appointment was 52.4 from 2011 to 2015; 52.7 from 2015 to 2020 and 52.6 from 2011 to 2020. The median age at appointment was 52, 53 and 52 respectively.

262. There was a total of 598 appointments during the 9.5-year period.

I. Summary of Compensation Amounts

268. In this section, I summarise the compensation amounts for federally appointed judges, self-employed lawyers and deputy ministers (including government appointments to GC and GCQ senior positions) for 2015 to the most recent year data is available.

269. The first set of tables shows the base salary[68] for these positions. Note that these numbers should not be compared between tables as that would be an "apples and Oranges" comparison. The second set of tables shows the total compensation[69] for these positions

Summary of Base Salaries

Table 270 - Base Judicial Salary – 2015 to 2021

271. Table 271 shows the net incomes of self-employed lawyers at the 70th percentile and above based on all ages (34 to 69) and all regions of Canada.

68 Base Judicial Salary, net income and base salary respectively for judges, self-employed lawyers and deputy ministers and senior government appointees.

69 Base Judicial Total Compensation, net income and total compensation respectively for judges, self-employed lawyers and deputy ministers and senior government appointees.

273. Past Quadrennial Commissions have been provided with the percentile comparisons of Base Judicial Salary with the net earnings of self-employed lawyers. As discussed above (paragraphs 31 to 34), in my opinion this is a misleading and inappropriate comparison.

Base Judicial Salary

274. The 2019 Base Judicial Salary of $329,900 is about the 80th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

275. The 2020 Base Judicial Salary of $338,800 is about the 80th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

70 For DM-4, GC-09 and GC-10 positions, the amounts were estimated by me as described in the footnotes to Tables 231 and 234a.

276. The 2021 Base Judicial Salary of $361,600 is about the 82nd percentile of self-employed lawyers.

Base Salary of Prothonotaries

277. The 2019 base salary of a prothonotary of $263,900 is about the 74th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

278. The 2020 base salary of a prothonotary of $271,000 is about the 74th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

279. The 2021 estimated base salary of a prothonotary of $289,200 is about the 76th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

Summary of Total Compensation

280. Table 280 shows the Base Judicial Total Compensation for selected judicial offices. There are other offices not shown here that receive a supplement in addition to the amounts shown in this table. The amounts shown for the year beginning April 2021 are calculated by me based on my estimate of the increase in the Industrial Aggregate.

281. Table 281 shows the net incomes of self-employed lawyers at the 70th percentile and above based on all ages (34 to 69) and all regions of Canada[71].

[71] This is the same as Table 271 since there is no difference between the concept of a base salary and total compensation for a self-employed lawyer.

Base Judicial Total Compensation and Self-Employed Lawyers Net Income

283. The 2019 Base Judicial Total Compensation (the $496,000 shown in Table 280 for Puisne Judges) is at about the 88th percentile of self-employed lawyers.

284. The 2020 Base Judicial Total Compensation (the $509,400 shown in Table 280 for Puisne Judges) is at about the 88th percentile of self-employed lawyers based on my estimation of the increase in self-employed lawyers net income for 2020[73].

285. The 2021 Base Judicial Total Compensation (the $543,800 shown in Table 280 for Puisne Judges) is at about the 89th percentile of self-employed lawyers based on my estimation of the increase in self-employed lawyers net income for 2021[74].

72 For DM-4, GC-09 and GC-10 positions, the amounts were estimated by me as described in the footnotes to Tables 230d and 233a and b.

73 To estimate the net income of self-employed lawyers in 2020, I projected their 2019 net income together with an increase based on the average annual increases from 2015 to 2019.

74 To estimate the net income of self-employed lawyers in 2021, I projected their 2019 net income together with two years of increase based on the average annual increases from 2015 to 2019.

Total Compensation of Prothonotaries

286. The 2019 base salary of a prothonotary was $263,900, beginning April 2020 it is $271,000 and I estimate beginning April 2021 it will be $289,200 (80% of the Base Judicial Salary).

287. Using the same adjustments to obtain total compensation as used for puisne judges[75], I determined the total compensation of a prothonotary.

288. The 2019 average total compensation of a prothonotary is $397,300 (Table 280). That is about the 84th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

289. The 2020 average total compensation of a prothonotary is $408,100 (Table 280). That is about the 84th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

290. The 2021 average total compensation of a prothonotary is estimated to be $435,500. (Table 280). That is about the 86th percentile for all self-employed lawyers in Canada.

[75] Take the base salary, add the value of the Judicial Annuity (based on the average value of 49.51%) and add the value of the government paying half of the Canada Pension plan contribution. This implicitly assumes that prothonotaries have a similar age profile at appointment as do the federally appointed judges.

Appendix 3 Summary of Judicial Annuity Benefits

Full Benefit	66.7% of final year salary
Eligibility for Full Benefit	1. Age 75 with at least 10 years of service. 2. At least 15 years of service with the sum of age plus service equalling 80 or more. 3. At least 10 years of service while a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. 4. Permanent disability.
Eligibility for a reduced benefit	1. Age 75 2. Age 55 with at least 10 years of service
Reduced benefit amount	At age 75 with less than 10 years of service, the reduced benefit is pro rata to service. e.g. with 7 years of service, the reduced benefit is 70% of the Full Benefit. For ages 60 to 74, where age plus service is less than 80, the reduced benefit is pro rata to service. e.g. with 10 years of service at age 60, the sum of age and service is 70. It will take 5 more years of service to reach a total of 80 (at age 65 with 15 years of service). the reduced benefit is 10/15^{ths}, or 66.7% of the Full Benefit. For ages under 60 with age plus service less than 80, the reduced benefit is pro rata as in the previous paragraph plus an additional 5% reduction for each year prior to age 60.
Indexing	The benefit payable is adjusted each year based on the changes in the Consumer Price Index as of 30 September.
Survivor benefit	If the judge's spouse at the time of retirement is alive following the judge's death, a surviving spouse benefit equal to 50% of the amount payable to the judge will continue for the surviving spouse's lifetime.
Refund of contributions	If both ethe judge and spouse should die prior to receiving a total benefit at least equal to the judge's contributions plus interest, the difference is paid as a lump sum.
Death before retirement	A lump sum equal to 16.7% of earnings; plus A survivor annuity equal to 33.3% of final year salary is payable to a surviving spouse; plus A survivor annuity equal to 6.7% of final year salary is paid to each dependent child (maximum of 4) which amount is doubled if there is no surviving spouse.
Termination	A refund of contributions plus interest.
Contributions	The judge makes contributions each year prior to becoming eligible for a Full Benefit equal to 7% of salary and thereafter, 1% of salary.
Interest	Interest is credited on judges' contributions at the same rate that is paid on income tax refunds.

Appendix 4 Actuarial Assumptions Utilised

The actuarial assumptions I utilised for determining a value of the Judicial Annuity are the same as used in the Actuarial Report on the Pension Plan for the Federally Appointed Judges as at 31 March 2019 (the "Actuarial Report"), except where indicated otherwise.

Valuation Date	1 January 2021

Economic Assumptions (Expectations for the Future)

Interest Rate	4.50%
Inflation Rate	2.00%
Real Salary Increase	1.00%
Indexing of annuity after retirement	2.00%
Interest on Contributions	4.50%

Demographic Assumptions

Gender	41% of judges are assumed to be female and 59% male.
Appointment to Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice	4 appointments annually
Appointment to Supreme Court	0.4 appointments annually
Retirement	Varies by age and service. The rates used in the Actuarial Report assume the probability of retirement increases after 14 complete years of service. At that point, many of the judges will be 12-months from earnings a full pension and I have assumed they will most likely work that additional year unless in poor health. I therefore utilised the same rates as set out in the Actuarial Report, but based on one additional year of service.

Sample Rates of Retirement

	Completed Years of Service
Age Last Birthday	0 to 9	10 to 14	15	16	17	20	25+
Under 55	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
55	-	0.5%	0.5%	0.5%	0.5%	0.5%	15.0%
60	-	0.5%	0.5%	0.5%	0.5%	13.0%	2.0%
65	-	0.5%	6.0%	3.0%	3.0%	5.0%	6.0%
70	-	0.5%	12.0%	4.0%	8.0%	8.0%	8.0%
75	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%

Permanent Disability	Varies by age.

Sample Rates of Disability

Age Last Birthday	Male	Female
40	0.2	0.4
50	0.7	1.0
70	6.4	10.1

Termination	Judges are assumed to leave the bench without qualifying for an annuity with a probability of 3% in their first year of service, 2% in the second year and 1% per annum for years 3 to 9. After reaching 10 years of service, all departures from the bench are treated as a retirement, disability or death.
Death	Ignored prior to retirement. Based on the mortality assumptions after retirement
Mortality	Canadian Pensioner Mortality Table for public sector workers with allowance or future mortality improvements based on the CPM-B projection factors. An adjustment for the size of the retirement income was made -- for males, 74% of those rates were used and for females, 92%.
Surviving Spouse	The probability of having a surviving spouse at death as well as the number of surviving children and their assumed age was taken from the 2016 Actuarial Report (Table 23) as that report contained more detail about this assumption. The 2019 Actuarial report stated the assumptions were the same as in 2016. For males, the probability of having a surviving spouse is 98% at age 60 decreasing to 74% at 80 and to 17% at 100. For females, the probability of having a surviving spouse is 83% at age 60 decreasing to 35% at 80 and to 2% at 100. Spouses are assumed to be of the opposite gender from the judge with the male spouse being about 3 years older (spousal age differences vary by age of the judge)

A. BACKGROUND

1. The Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission (the "Commission") delivered the Sixth Report and Recommendations of the Commission to the Minister of Justice of Canada on August 30, 2021 (the "Report").

2. The Report contains a detailed recommendation ("Recommendation 8") that the parties promptly begin preparatory work to collect various data points for use by the Seventh Quadrennial Commission. Recommendation 8 includes a recommendation that the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs ("FJA") begin preparation now of statistical data for each province and territories as to compensation levels of appointees immediately prior to their appointment ("Recommendation 8(5)(c)").

3. The relevance and appropriateness of collecting of pre-appointment income data ("PAI data") is a highly contentious issue that has been debated extensively before two previous Commissions. Both the Block and Rémillard Commissions concluded that collecting PAI data was problematic, and that the data was not useful to determining the adequacy of judicial salaries. The issue was not raised or debated before this Commission.

4. Representatives of the Canadian Superior Court Judges Association (the "Association"), the Canadian Judicial Council (the "Council") (collectively, the "Judiciary"), the Associate Judges of the Federal Court, the Government of Canada, FJA, and the Canadian Revenue Agency ("CRA") met for the first time on November 23, 2022 to discuss Recommendation 8 and the way forward for the next Commission. The Judiciary conveyed that it had been surprised by the inclusion of Recommendation 8(5)(c) in the Report, given that the issue had not been raised by any party, and particularly in light of the long history surrounding this issue, the conclusions of the Block and Rémillard Commissions, and the established doctrine that valid reasons are required to depart from the conclusions of a previous Commission. The Judiciary understands that the Government of Canada was also surprised at the inclusion of Recommendation 8(5)(c). However, the Government indicated that it had committed, on December 29, 2021, to implement the Commission's Report, and therefore took the position that the Judiciary should raise its objection with the Commission.

5. On February 13, 2023, the Association and Council wrote to the Commission to express its concerns and seek the Commission's guidance. On February 16, 2023, the Government of Canada wrote to the Commission indicating that it was prepared to act on the Commission's recommendations but would await the Commission's further direction regarding Recommendation 8(5)(c) before collecting any data.

6. On February 24, 2023, the Commission issued a Ruling Respecting Recommendation 8(5)(c) of the Report of the Sixth Quadrennial Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission (the "Ruling"). The Commission directed that Counsel for the Judiciary file any written submissions in favour of the position that it wishes the Commission to take with respect to the implementation of Recommendation 8(5)(c) by April 10, 2023 and set a schedule for the submissions of the Government and any other hearing participant, and any responses or replies. The Commission directed that the submissions be delivered in a form that supports a determination in writing, and that if a party wishes an oral hearing, it should make that request, and the Commission will determine whether an oral hearing is necessary after receipt of all written submissions.

B. OVERVIEW OF THE JUDICIARY'S POSITION

7. The Judiciary thanks the Commission for the opportunity to make submissions on Recommendation 8(5)(c) and wishes to address at the outset the timing of this issue arising.

8. The Judiciary's surprise and concern with Recommendation 8(5)(c) were immediate upon the release of the Report. Careful consideration was given by the Association and Council at the time to immediately register the Judiciary's objection given that the collection of PAI Data had not been requested by any hearing participant nor had it been raised in any written or oral submissions made to the Commission. However, considering that the absence of any such request or debate was a matter of record and could not be disputed, the Judiciary deferred raising this issue until its first post-Report meeting with the Government and the FJA, in the hope of coming to the Commission with a common position.

9. The Parties' first meeting to discuss the implementation of Recommendation 8 took place on November 23, 2022. The Judiciary raised its objection to the collection of PAI Data at that meeting. The Government took the matter under consideration and, in a subsequent communication, suggested that the Judiciary informally raise the question with the Commission. The Judiciary's letter followed shortly thereafter.

10. The Judiciary also wishes to address at the outset the statement in paragraph 64 of the Judiciary's March 29, 2021 Submission, referenced in the Ruling, that a major cause of the drop in interest from lawyers in private practice is the income gap between what outstanding candidates earn in private practice and the judicial salary. With respect, this submission does not express a position on the advisability of collecting PAI data – that is, data regarding the pre-appointment income of those who have accepted an appointment. Rather, it reflects the Judiciary's long-held view that it is imperative to collect accurate data regarding the income of top private practice lawyers more broadly, as reflected in Recommendation 8(1). In no way did this submission signal a change in the Judiciary's consistent position that collecting PAI data specifically is a breach of privacy, is self-serving, and is of little relevance to understanding the situation of those who are not applying.

11. The Judiciary's position with respect to Recommendation 8(5)(c) is that implementation of the recommendation should be deferred at this time for the following reasons:

    a. Recommendation 8(5)(c) was issued without giving the parties an opportunity to be heard;
    b. Recommendation 8(5)(c) departs from the findings of previous Commissions contrary to the Commissions' established principles and the expectations of the parties;
    c. In accordance with the approach of previous Commissions, the parties should be given an opportunity to first consult and attempt to agree on the subject-matter of Recommendation 8(5)(c). Absent agreement, if the Government wishes to raise the issue of PAI data before this Commission or a future Commission, then the Government should make a full and transparent proposal setting forth:

1. the type of data that will be collected;
2. how the consent of appointees will be obtained prior to collecting their PAI data;
3. how the data will be collected so as to both protect appointees' privacy and ensure the data can be reliably tested;
4. the use the Government intends to make of the data; and
5. the reasons advanced for seeking to depart from the conclusions of previous Commissions as regards the relevance and usefulness of PAI data;

the whole so as to give the Judiciary – and the Commission – a proper opportunity to review the proposal, potentially with the assistance of experts, as has been done before previous Commissions.

C. DETAILED SUBMISSIONS

I. Procedural Fairness in the Context of Compensation Commissions Requires Notice and an Opportunity To Be Heard on Recommendations

a. General Principles Regarding Procedural Fairness

12. Although the Commission is not strictly adversarial, it is bound by the duty of procedural fairness. The duty of fairness "extends to all administrative bodies acting under statutory authority".[1] It is triggered by "[t]he fact that a decision is administrative and affects the rights, privileges or interests of an individual".[2]

13. Even where an administrative body only issues "recommendations", it may be bound by the duty of fairness "where the recommendation process is an integral part of the decision-making process […]."[3] The duty of fairness has been held to apply to bodies making recommendations under statutory authority, including a judicial council and its committee of inquiry[4] and commissions of inquiry, even if their findings "cannot result in either penal or civil consequences for a witness".[5]

14. Applying the above principles, there is no doubt the Commission is bound by the duty of procedural fairness. The Commission acts under the statutory authority of s. 26 of the Judges Act and its work has a significant impact on the rights of the parties. Although its recommendations are not binding, its work must be given "meaningful effect" in the process of determining judicial remuneration.[6] As the Supreme Court has stated, "[t]he commission's recommendations must be given weight. They have to be considered by the judiciary and the government."[7] Indeed, the government can only reject or vary the Commission's recommendations where legitimate reasons are given, and its response is subject to judicial review.[8]

b. The Content of Procedural Fairness

15. While the content of the duty of fairness varies according to the circumstances, at its core, it ensures that administrative bodies provide "an opportunity for those affected by [their] decision to put forward their views and evidence fully and have them considered by the decision-maker."[9] Accordingly, even when the content of the duty is minimal, a decision-maker must provide notice to the affected party regarding its decision and receive and consider the affected party's submissions.[10]

[10] Canada (Attorney General) v. Mavi, 2011 SCC 30, [2011] 2 SCR 504, para. 5 [BDAC tab 7].

16. The expectations of the parties also play a role in determining the content of the duty of fairness. Where a party "has a legitimate expectation that a certain procedure will be followed, this procedure will be required by the duty of fairness".[11]

17. In Bodner, the Supreme Court emphasized that the commission's recommendations had to result from a fair hearing after considering the submissions of the parties:

> The commission must objectively consider the submissions of all parties and any relevant factors identified in the enabling statute and regulations. Its recommendations must result from a fair and objective hearing. Its report must explain and justify its position.[12]

18. In the context of compensation commissions, procedural fairness is not just a legal requirement; it goes to the legitimacy of the enterprise as "independent, objective and impartial."[13] As the Supreme Court stated in the PEI Reference, objectivity is best promoted by ensuring a commission is "fully informed before deliberating and making its recommendations."[14]

19. As noted in the Judiciary's letter dated February 13, 2023, from its inception more than 20 years ago, the Commission has always ensured the respect of the parties' right to be heard regarding issues that may form the subject of formal recommendations. Whenever this foundational principle has been perceived to be at risk, the parties have acted to safeguard it.

20. The baseline requirements of procedural fairness and the legitimate expectations of the parties thus required the Commission to provide the parties with notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to issuing Recommendation 8(5)(c).

21. The requirement to provide notice and an opportunity to be heard is all the more acute given that the subject-matter of Recommendation 8(5)(c) – the collection of PAI data – has already received extensive consideration by previous Commissions, as set out more fully below.

II. The Conclusions of Previous Commissions Should Not Be Departed From Without Valid Reason

a. General Principles Regarding the Conclusions of Previous Commissions

22. Recommendation 8(5)(c) also engages procedural fairness because of the repeated principle that Commissions will give "careful consideration to the reasoning of previous Commissions" and that valid reasons – such as a change in circumstances or additional evidence – are required to depart from the conclusions of a previous commission.

23. In Bodner, the Supreme Court established that commissions should take note of the work and recommendations of their predecessors:

> Each commission must make its assessment in its own context. However, this rule does not mean that each new compensation commission operates in a void, disregarding the work and recommendations of its predecessors. The reports of previous commissions and their outcomes form part of the background and context that a new compensation committee should consider.[15]

24. Past Commissions have considered this issue. The Block Commission (2008) first suggested that "[w]here consensus has emerged around a particular issue during a previous Commission inquiry […] in the absence of demonstrated change, […] such a consensus [should] be recognized by subsequent Commissions and arguably reflected in the approach taken to the question in the submissions of the parties."[16]

25. The Levitt Commission (2012) issued a Notice prior to its inquiry that it had determined that in the absence of "a change in facts or circumstances", the Commission "intend[ed] to regard" recommendations from the previous commission "as a settled matter of principle."[17]

[17] Notice issued by the Judicial Compensation and Benefits Commission on December 8, 2011 [BDAC tab 10].

26. Of note, the Government submitted that this Notice was inconsistent with the Commission's mandate, the principles of natural justice and its right to be heard.[18] However, following submissions on the appropriateness of relying on recommendations of a prior commission, the Levitt Report decided that "in arriving at its recommendations, it is entitled to take into account recommendations made by a previous commission, in the absence of a demonstrated change, where consensus has emerged around a particular issue during a previous commission inquiry."[19] It issued a formal recommendation to the same effect.[20]

27. The Rémillard Commission adopted a similar approach:

> We approached matters decided by previous Commissions and Special Advisors in light of the evidence and arguments made before us. We adopted a common sense approach: careful consideration has been given to the reasoning of previous Commissions as well as to the evidence brought before us. Valid reasons were required – such as a change in current circumstances or additional new evidence – to depart from the conclusions of a previous Commission.[21]

28. In its more recent submissions to this latest Commission, the Government accepted that the Commission should follow this "common sense approach",[22] which the Judiciary supported.[23] This Commission itself also acceded to this approach:

> [W]e have tried to follow the common sense approach applied by the Rémillard Commission by giving careful consideration to the reasoning of previous Commissions as well as to the evidence before us. If valid reasons exist to change an approach, be it a change in circumstances, additional new evidence or developments to date, we took them into consideration in our deliberations before arriving at > our recommendations. We believe that we have brought a fair and objective approach to any competing considerations.[24]

29. Thus, all participants in this process had a shared understanding that the Commission would only depart from the conclusions of a previous Commission for "valid reasons" such as a change in circumstances or new evidence. This shared understanding reflected the approach of the three previous Commissions, as well as the current Commission.

b. The Conclusions of Previous Commissions on PAI Data

30. The collection of PAI data is an issue on which the parties traditionally have had opposing views, and hence it has been the subject of extensive evidence and debate before two previous Commissions – Block and Rémillard – both of which concluded that this type of data was of minimal relevance.

i. The Block Commission (2008)

31. The Block Commission had the benefit of extensive evidence and submissions on the usefulness of PAI data before reaching its conclusion that the data was of little use in determining the adequacy of judicial salaries.[25]

32. Before the Block Commission, the Government actually submitted a PAI study, with data from the CRA about the pre-appointment income of judges between 1995 and 2007. The data collected by CRA, which, notably, could not be verified for privacy reasons, indicated that 62 % of appointees who had been self-employed lawyers received an increase in income upon their appointment.[26] The Judiciary had serious concerns about the reliability of this conclusion and the underlying data, but its expert was refused access to the raw data for privacy reasons.[27]

33. The Judiciary also objected to the PAI study on procedural bases, noting that "the Government ought to have disclosed to the judiciary that it would be seeking to collect this data for use before the Commission, so as to give the judiciary an opportunity to comment on the proposed data collection and the methodology applied by the CRA."[28]

34. In addition, the Judiciary provided the Commission with an expert report from Navigant (encompassing 67 pages including appendixes) analyzing the data provided by the CRA. The Navigant Report concluded that it was "impossible to conclude" that the data was "valid or reliable" – in fact, there were "enough methodological problems in the PAI data as to render it unreliable".[29] The Navigant Report also concluded that, assuming the data was valid, its relevance was "very low" to determine an adequate level of judicial compensation to attract outstanding candidates.[30]

35. Considering both the PAI study and the critiques set out in the responsive expert opinion, the Judiciary filed a full brief on the sole question of PAI data,[31] raising several concerns regarding the appropriateness of the data, and its lack of relevance and reliability.[32] Regarding the relevance of the data, the Judiciary noted that the PAI study was not prospective in nature: it revealed "what individuals earned before appointment, not the future earning prospects that they would take into account in deciding whether to accept a judicial appointment."[33] The issue was debated at length during the oral hearings in front of the Block Commission.[34]

36. With the benefit of actual data, expert reports, and full submissions on the PAI issue, the Block Commission concluded:

> We are […] not in a position to judge whether the information obtained is accurate. In any case, the information provided to us only served to confirm that some appointees earn less prior to appointment and some earn more.
> We do not believe that a snapshot of appointees' salaries prior to appointment is particularly useful in helping to determine the adequacy of judicial salaries. Such a study does not tell us whether judicial salaries deter outstanding candidates who are in the higher income brackets of private practice from applying for judicial appointment.[35]
> [Emphasis added.]

37. Moreover, the Block Report strongly urged that should the Government seek to adduce such information in the future, prior consultation occur so as to collect information that "both parties agree is reliable and useful".[36]

ii. The Rémillard Commission (2016)

38. None of the parties raised the issue of PAI data or sought recommendations on the subject in front of the Levitt Commission (2012). However, the relevance of PAI data to the Commission's mandate was raised again by the Government before the Rémillard Commission, which reached the same conclusion as the Block Commission.

39. This time, the Government brought a motion at a preliminary stage asking the Commission to undertake a study on the PAI of sitting judges, along with 14 pages of submissions and multiple appendixes setting out the purported relevance and probative value of the data, along with a proposed process to obtain such data.[37]

[35] Block Report, paras 89-90 [BDAC tab 9].
[36] Block Report, para. 91: "Should similar information be sought in the future, we urge the Government and the Association and Council to consult on the design and execution of such studies to ensure that future commissions are provided with information that both parties agree is reliable and useful." [BDAC tab 9].
[37] Submissions of the Government of Canada on the Proposal for a Pre-Appointment Income Study (January 19, 2016) [BDAC tab 20].

40. The Judiciary was given the opportunity to file a 13-page response on this sole question, and raised several concerns, including that (i) the information sought was not relevant, since it would not say anything about lawyers who have not applied, yet would be outstanding candidates, (ii) the proposed PAI study was self-serving, and (iii) the proposed study would generate incomplete data.[38] The Judiciary noted that should the Commission undertake a PAI study, the Judiciary would need to have an expert "review, analyze and possibly file an expert report on this subject" and be given the opportunity to make submissions to the Commission "on the data generated and the expert evidence filed".[39]

41. The Rémillard Commission dismissed the Government's motion on the grounds that the question was premature and that the benefits of the study had not been established considering the absence of "a fully developed set of submissions and a record".[40]

42. In its main submissions to the Rémillard Commission, the Government renewed its request for a PAI study. The Judiciary filed expert evidence concluding that the PAI study would not produce reliable or needed data to assist the Commission with its mandate.[41] The issue was again fully debated during the oral hearings. [42]

43. With the benefit of expert evidence and full submissions on the subject of PAI data, the Rémillard Commission reached conclusions on both the substantive and procedural issues raised by the parties. It concluded once again that (i) simply collecting information about compensation levels of appointees prior to their appointment was not useful; and (ii) prior to any formal recommendation being issued with respect to future studies, the parties should consult and agree on the approach:

> 229. The pre-appointment income of those accepting an appointment does not tell us much about why other attractive candidates do not put their names forward and whether this is connected to a significant compensation reduction were they to accept a judicial appointment.
> 230. We agree with the Block Commission that a targeted survey of individuals who are at the higher end of the earning scale, and who could be objectively identified as outstanding potential candidates for judicial appointments, should be the focus of such a study. Linking that information with an analysis of whether the number of high-earning appointees is increasing or decreasing over time would be useful.
> 231. The Government and the Association and Council should consult on the design and execution of those types of studies to ensure that future Commissions receive useful information derived in a manner agreed upon by the parties.
> 232. Given the need for consultation and agreement on such an approach, we will not make a formal recommendation at this time.[43]

III. Impact of the Conclusions of Previous Commissions and the Requirements of Procedural Fairness on Recommendation 8(5)(c)

44. The Judiciary's surprise and objection to Recommendation 8(5)(c), as well its approach of first engaging with the Government at the November 23, 2022 meeting before returning to this Commission, are not only genuine but well-founded, given: (i) the conclusions of the Block and Rémillard Commissions, (ii) the established doctrine and practice that future Commissions will not depart from the conclusions of a previous Commission absent valid reasons and (iii) that the Government did not seek to reopen the issue of PAI data before this Commission.

45. Without notice that the Commission was considering making a recommendation on PAI data, the Judiciary was not afforded the opportunity to provide the Commission with the full context and history surrounding this issue[44] and the [43] Rémillard Report [BDAC tab 13].

[44] The only submissions made on this point are found in the Appendix to the Joint Submission of the CSCJA and CJC (March 29, 2021), which summarizes the history of the Triennial and Quadrennial Commission

Commission was not "fully informed before deliberating and making its recommendations".[45] In addition, the Commission did not provide any reasons or context for Recommendation 8(5)(c), and so the Judiciary is left in the dark as to the reasons – valid or not – the Commission may have relied upon for departing from the conclusions of previous Commissions. The Judiciary does not even know whether the Commission was aware that it was departing form the conclusions of previous Commissions, and that it was doing so in respect of a highly controversial issue.

46. Moreover, without any prior proposal or consultation with respect to the type of study to be conducted (as urged by both the Block and Rémillard Commissions), the Judiciary is unable to assess and adduce evidence regarding the reliability and usefulness of any such study and to make submissions to assist the Commission in determining whether and how such a study should be conducted.

47. For all the above reasons, the Judiciary respectfully submits that implementation of Recommendation 8(5)(c) should be deferred until such time as the parties have consulted and agreed on an approach to PAI data that is in keeping with the conclusions of the Block and Rémillard Commissions. Absent agreement, if the Government wishes to raise the issue of PAI data before this Commission or a future Commission, the Government should make a full and transparent proposal setting forth:

    1. the type of data that will be collected;
    2. how the consent of appointees will be obtained prior to collecting their PAI data;
    3. how the data will be collected so as to both protect appointees' privacy and ensure the data can be reliably tested;
    4. the use the Government intends to make of the data; and processes and refers to the conclusions of the Block Commission on the lack of usefulness of PAI data and the Judiciary's concerns for "individual privacy, the unreliability of the data and its lack of relevance" (p. 83) [BDAC tab 25].

[45] PEI Reference, para. 173 [BDAC tab 5].

5. the reasons advanced for seeking to depart from the conclusions of previous Commissions as regards the relevance and usefulness of PAI data;

the whole so as to give the Judiciary – and the Commission – a proper opportunity to review the proposal, potentially with the assistance of experts, as has been done before previous Commissions.

D ORDER SOUGHT

48. The Association and the Council respectfully request that this Commission defer Recommendation 8(5)(c) in accordance with paragraph [47], above.

The whole respectfully submitted on behalf of the Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association and the Canadian Judicial Council

Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights

Thursday, March 21, 2024

[English]

The Chair (Ms. Lena Metlege Diab (Halifax West, Lib.)): Good morning.

I call the meeting to order.

Welcome to meeting number 99 of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights.

Pursuant to the order adopted by the House on February 15, the committee is meeting in public to study the subject matter of the supplementary estimates, 2023-24, under the Department of Justice.

Today's meeting is taking place in a hybrid format. Members are attending in person in the room and remotely using the Zoom application.

Witnesses are all attending in person today. The members attending by video conference have been sound-tested and are aware of our procedure, including interpretation, so I won't go through that lengthy explanation this morning.

I want to inform the members that we're studying the subject matter of the supplementary estimates for the first hour. There will be no votes on the items.

I want to welcome today the Honourable Arif Virani, Minister of Justice and solicitor general of Canada.

It's not solicitor general. Solicitor general was back in the 1980s. The reason I know that is that I was in high school and I participated in the first model Parliament. I was nominated or elected—I don't know if it was a nomination or an election—as the solicitor general. After that, they deleted solicitor general from the books.

Welcome Attorney General.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin (Rivière-du-Nord, BQ): Was Mr. Virani already a member of Parliament at that time?

The Chair: I'm not sure he was even born.

Also, with Minister Virani, we have officials assisting us today.

Thank you for being here.

[Translation]

We have with us Shalene Curtis-Micallef, Deputy Minister and Deputy Attorney General of Canada; Michael Sousa, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Policy Sector; Bill Kroll, Chief Financial Officer and Assistant Deputy Minister, Management Sector; and Elizabeth Hendy, Director General, Programs Branch, Policy Sector.

Welcome to you all.

[English]

Thank you all for being with us today.

We will do the normal round of questioning and I will call witnesses.

Before we start, I want to say to the minister and his department that the letter was received from Nova Scotia Legal Aid thanking us for the support of a project for supporting racialized inmates incarcerated in federal and provincial correctional institutions in Nova Scotia. I want to put that on record.

Minister, you're ready to make a statement first. Please proceed.

[Translation]

Hon. Arif Virani (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Thank you, Chair, and members of the Committee.

Thank you for inviting me to join you today.

I would like to begin by acknowledging that we are meeting on the traditional unceded territory of the Algonquin Anishinaabe Nation.

As I am sure you have seen, a few weeks ago, I introduced Bill C-63, the Online Harms Act. I want to both explain the vital importance of the Online Harms Act and dispel misunderstandings about what it does and doesn't do.

The premise of this legislation is simple: we all expect to be safe in our homes, neighbourhoods and communities. We should be able to expect the same kind of security in our online communities. We need to address the online harms that threaten us, and especially our children, every day.

Let me start by talking about our children.

[English]

There are currently no safety standards mandated for the online platforms that kids use every day. In contrast, my children's LEGO in our basement is subject to rigorous safety standards and testing before my two boys get their hands on it. I know that these days my children spend much more time online than playing with their LEGO. The most dangerous toys in my home right now and in every Canadian home are the screens our children are on. Social media is everywhere. It brings unchecked dangers and horrific content. This, frankly, terrifies me. We need to make the Internet safe for our young people around the country.

As parents, one of the first things we teach all of our kids is how to cross the road. We tell them to wait for the green light. We tell them to look in both directions. We trust our children, but we also have faith in the rules of the road and that drivers will respect the rules of the road. We trust that cars will stop at a red light and obey the speed limit. Safety depends on a basic network of trust. This is exactly what we are desperately lacking in the digital world. The proposed online harms act would establish rules of the road for platforms so that we can teach our kids to be safe online, with the knowledge that platforms are also doing their part.

[Translation]

Now, let's talk about hate crimes.

The total number of police-reported hate crimes in Canada has reached its highest level on record, nearly doubling the rate recorded in 2019.

[English]

Police across the country are calling the increase “staggering”. Toronto Police Chief Myron Demkiw said this week that hate crime calls in Toronto have increased by 93% since last October. Communities and law enforcement have been calling on governments to act.

Bill C-63 creates a new stand-alone hate crime offence to make sure that hate crimes are properly prosecuted and identified. Under our current legal system, hate motivation for a crime is only considered as an afterthought at the sentencing stage; it is not part of the offence-laying itself. The threshold for criminal hatred is high. Comments that offend, humiliate or insult do not hit the standard of hatred. They are what we call awful but lawful. The definition of hate that we are embedding in the Criminal Code comes straight from the Supreme Court of Canada in the Keegstra and Whatcott decisions. We did not make up the definition of hatred that we are proposing.

It has been disappointing, though not surprising, to see the wildly inaccurate assertions made by some commentators about how sentencing for this new hate crime provision would work. I have heard some claim that, under this provision, someone who commits an offence under the National Parks Act would now be subject to a life sentence. That is simply false.

In Canada, judges impose sentences following sentencing ranges established through past decisions. Judges are required by law—and every member of this committee who is a lawyer will know this—to impose sentences that are proportionate to the offence committed. In other words, the punishment must always fit the crime. If judges impose sentences that are unfit, we have appeal courts that can overturn those sentences.

You may be asking, “Well, why not specify that, Minister? Why put a maximum sentence of life in the new hate crime offence-laying provision?”

Let me explain.

First, it's important to remember that a maximum sentence is not an average sentence; it's an absolute ceiling.

Second, the new hate crime offence captures any existing offence if it was hate-motivated. That can run the gamut from a hate-motivated theft all the way to a hate-motivated attempted murder. The sentencing range entrenched in Bill C-63 was designed to mirror the existing sentencing options for all of these potential underlying offences, from the most minor to the most serious offences on the books, such as attempted murder, which can attract, right now, a life sentence.

[Translation]

This does not mean that minor offences will suddenly receive extremely harsh sentences. This would violate all the legal principles that sentencing judges are required to follow. Hate-motivated murder will result in a life sentence. A minor infraction will certainly not result in it.

Another criticism I have heard is that this bill could stifle freedom of expression. This is simply not true. On the contrary, this bill strengthens freedom of expression. There are people in Canada who cannot speak out because they legitimately fear for their safety. When they speak out, they are mistreated and subjected to truly despicable threats, intimidation and harassment.

[English]

This is carefully balanced. We consulted. We looked abroad.

We do not automatically take down material within 24 hours except for child sexual abuse material or revenge pornography. We do not touch private communications. We do not affect individual websites that do not host user-generated content.

● (0830)

[Translation]

This bill protects children and gives everyone the tools they need to protect themselves online. We do not tolerate hate speech in the public square. Nor must we tolerate hate speech online.

We have seen the consequences of unchecked online hate and child sexual exploitation. Ask the families of the six people killed at the Quebec City mosque by someone who was radicalized online.

[English]

Ask the young boy orphaned by the horrific attack on four members of the Afzaal family in London, Ontario. Ask the parents of young people right across this country who have taken their own lives after being sextorted by online predators.

Finally, let me set the record straight on the peace bond provision in Bill C-63. Peace bonds are not house arrests. Peace bonds are not punishments. Peace bonds are well-established tools used to impose individually tailored conditions on someone when there is credible evidence to show that they may hurt someone or commit a crime. The proposed peace bond here would operate very similarly to existing peace bonds.

As an example, if someone posts online about their plan to deface or attack a synagogue to intimidate the Jewish community, members of the synagogue could take this information to the police and the court. They could seek to have a peace bond imposed after obtaining consent from the provincial attorney general. Decades of case law tell us that conditions must be reasonable and linked to the specific threat. Here conditions imposed on the person could include staying 100 metres away from that synagogue for a period of 12 months. If the person breached that simple condition, they could be arrested. If they abided by the conditions, they would face no consequences.

I ask you this: Why should members of that synagogue, when facing a credible threat of being targeted by a hate-motivated crime, have to wait to be attacked or to have a swastika graffitied on the front door before we act to help them? If we can prevent some attacks from happening, isn't that much better? Peace bonds are not perfect, but we believe they can be a valuable tool to keep people safe. In the face of rising hate crime, our government believes that doing nothing in an instance like this would be irresponsible.

I think that's what explains both CIJA's and the special envoy on anti-Semitism's support of Bill C-63.

[Translation]

As always, I am open to good faith suggestions to improve this legislation. My goal is to get it right. I look forward to debating the Online Harms Act in the House of Commons and following the committee's process as it reaches that stage. I am convinced that we all have the same goal here: we need to create a safe online world, especially for the most vulnerable members of our society—our children.

[English]

Thank you for your time.

I'm happy to take your questions.

The Chair: Thank you.

[Translation]

We will now begin the first round.

Mr. Van Popta, you have the floor for six minutes.

[English]

Mr. Tako Van Popta (Langley—Aldergrove, CPC): Thank you, Madam Chair.

Thank you, Mr. Attorney General and all of the rest of the witnesses, for being with us here today.

Mr. Attorney General, you're the top lawyer in the land. It's good to have you here at the justice committee.

Canada is a rule-of-law nation. We function well only if citizens of the nation have confidence in the administration of justice. That's your job. This is true for the criminal justice system, as it is for the civil justice system.

That's why it's so shocking to hear from a credible organization like the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association, in a letter from four years ago that was addressed to your predecessor, Mr. Lametti, the following:

> Our Supreme Court of British Columbia is presently 7 judges below complement. As a result, parties are regularly arriving at court for trials and hearings [and they're] being sent away because of a lack of judges to hear the cases. [The] parties have...spent substantial time and money preparing for court appearances, and witnesses have also been inconvenienced.

Then it goes on to talk about the financial and emotional costs.

There's an example from a lawyer. You'll appreciate this, of course, being a lawyer yourself. It was, “I have had this problem [of delays] five times I can remember in the last 18 months. [...] It happened twice in Cranbrook [Supreme Court] resulting in the client being unable to enforce a restrictive covenant” before it expired. It's difficult enough to enforce a restrictive covenant, but this person never even had an opportunity to try, so they feel that justice has been denied.

My question to you, Mr. Attorney General, is why is justice being denied to people in my home province of British Columbia?

● (0835)

Hon. Arif Virani: I would say to you that I am acutely aware of the need to fulfill judicial vacancies. I would note for the record that in seven months in office I have appointed 74 judges thus far, and there are more to come in the immediate days to follow.

I think it's important, for comparison purposes, to reflect on the record of the previous government, which we replaced in 2015. The average number of appointments annually by that government was 65. By that metric, I'm working twice as fast as the previous government.

It's important to understand how delays occur in the criminal justice system and the civil justice system, but also who is responsible for the delays. The administration of justice in this country is, in the main, the purview of the provinces, and delays are also caused by a lack of courts and a lack of court staffing across provinces in this country.

You mentioned “confidence in the administration of justice”. I share your concern. It's entrenched in our charter, and it's a fundamental part of what I do. What I've seen fit to do is ensure that our JACs—our judicial appointments committees—have quorum and that they are able to do the work they are required to do in terms of nominating judges, such that they present recommendations to me.

Alternatively, what I have seen in provincial levels of government in terms of their own judicial appointments processes is stacking judicial appointments committees with staffers of the governing party. That relates to my province, not yours, but I think that actually undermines confidence in the administration of justice, because it injects partisanship in the appointments process. That's not what we need. We have ensured a non-partisan process that is robust and that helps us establish judges of the highest quality to represent the diversity of the country. I'll continue to appoint people of that nature.

Mr. Tako Van Popta: Thanks for that answer.

You've said that you are appointing a record number of judges. Fair enough—I don't argue with that—but the chief justice of Canada, Richard Wagner, talked about the government's inertia regarding vacancies and the lack of satisfactory explanations for these delays.

This is what he says: “The slowness of appointments is all the more difficult to understand since most judicial vacancies are predictable.”

Now, you've said that you're appointing more judges than the Conservatives ever did, but of course, sir, the circumstances are quite different than they were a decade ago, when the Conservatives were the governing party. You have the reality of a demographic of a large number of aging baby boomers, so it is your job to fill those vacancies. It is your job to stand up to the challenge of the day. My question is whether your government is up to those challenges.

Hon. Arif Virani: In terms of the number of judges we have appointed since 2015, it's over 700. Last year, David Lametti and I appointed 100 judges in total. That's never been done in Canadian history. As I said to you, I've appointed 74 in seven months. That is a faster pace than has ever been seen and twice as fast as the previous government.

Is there an issue with respect to appointing judges and the speed at which it is taking place? This is a top priority for me and has been since I took over in this job. In terms of structural changes I've done, I have convened all of the heads of the judicial appointment committees. I have written to them about the need for urgency in terms of making suggestions. I have worked with my deputy and other officials in government to facilitate the speed with which security clearances are obtained. I've made structural changes such that the JACs now sit for three years and their assessments are valid for three years. Every time I tour anywhere in this country, I talk about the need for people to apply: people of the highest quality who represent the diversity of this country.

Other aspects that relate to the need for judges are informed by the courts themselves. The courts tell me that we need a specific expertise, a family law lawyer, a person who has expertise in insolvency matters.... Sometimes, provinces that don't have significant francophone populations still require bilingual jurists, because of the need to address francophone litigants. We are always attentive to the needs of the court, we remain so and we are working very closely with those chief judges to meet the needs of their courts quickly.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Mr. Mendicino, you have six minutes.

Hon. Marco Mendicino (Eglinton—Lawrence, Lib.): Thanks very much, Madam Chair.

Good morning, Minister.

Thank you to you and your officials for your introductory remarks with respect to this important piece of legislation. I think we're all united in wanting to see a thorough debate about this given the social harms that are at play, in particular with regard to vulnerable Canadians, young Canadians, women and others.

I really want to zero in on the part of the bill that deals with a digital safety commission because, on my first reading of this proposed legislation, the powers that would be imbued within this new commission are extensive. Again, on my first review of this legislation, it would make certain content inaccessible. It would create new investigative powers. It would create a forum in which there could be hearings that could be closed to the public given certain sensitivities that may be in play, as well as privacy considerations. The commission would have the power to create regulations and codes of conduct and also levy quite significant penalties.

Given that, would you agree, Minister, that the chair of this commission will have quite a significant authority in those areas?

● (0840)

Hon. Arif Virani: This is a big step forward for Canada. We thought really long and hard about how to structure it. We looked at different examples around the world, including the e-safety commissioner in Australia, but we also thought very hard about the confidence that I think Canadians need to have in this new officer, given the powers they will wield.

That's why you'll find in the bill what is a very pronounced declaration that we will say the confidence of Canadians will be ensured by having a vote cast in the House of Commons and the Senate in Canada to support the implementation and appointment of that new digital safety commissioner. That gives Canadians, through their elected representatives and through their parliamentarians, a direct line of accountability.

I think the measures we're taking are significant, but I would also point to the fact that most people are aware of Frances Haugen, the famous Facebook whistle-blower who testified at Congress. She described this as best-in-class, world-leading legislation for ensuring the accountability we need to see of social media companies, including the significant penalties of up to 6% or, in the case of a contravention offence, 8% of global revenue.

Hon. Marco Mendicino: On the vote, are you worried that it could become the subject of partisanship? You and I have participated in many votes, and the opposition has every right to use the tools within its reach to encourage debate.

My question is whether or not, given the functions within this particular commission, including voting on the chair of that commission is potentially susceptible to making this commission political.

Hon. Arif Virani: On the issue of protecting children, empowering adults and protecting minorities who are vulnerable, I think we have to rise above partisanship. I don't mean to sound Pollyannaish.

As a case in point, among the legislation we've consulted around the world, there's one piece that's been promoted by the Conservative government of Rishi Sunak in the last 14 months. Conservative governments around the world and Liberal governments around the world are acting in this area because the need to act is severe. That's the first point.

The second point is that I believe we can co-operate. I believe that empowering all parties—from the smallest party or an independent member to the official opposition or the government—to vote on this demonstrates that we want Canadians to have confidence, and we're determined to ensure that they have confidence in such a significant office.

Hon. Marco Mendicino: It's clear you've given a lot of consideration to the model of choosing who will be the first chair of this commission once it's in effect.

Would you agree that the chair will have powers that make the role quasi-judicial? In other words, they will be similar to the role that judges play and the role of other individuals who are responsible for the administration of tribunals, which will adjudicate on the kinds of issues that are contemplated in this bill?

Hon. Arif Virani: There is no doubt that determining whether the safety plan meets the standards that are required in issuing orders and determining whether offences have occurred and issuing penalties have aspects of quasi-judicial functions.

What's also important is that, as a lawyer should, I ascertained and verified that we would also have procedural fairness at every step of the way for the parties that are involved, as well as the possibility for judicial review in a court of law after the fact. You get Facebook making a determination. That's reviewed by the new digital safety commissioner. The digital safety commissioner's decision can also then be reviewed in a court of law.

I'm steadfast in my belief that Canadians have confidence in our world-class jurors and in their ability to execute an impartial determination about the veracity and validity of those decisions. That's important for procedural fairness. It's important for confidence in the administration of justice.

Hon. Marco Mendicino: That's quite clear through your intervention.

Are there any other positions that are quasi-judicial in their nature and are subject to a vote in the way the digital service commission is being proposed in this legislation through both the House and the Senate?

Hon. Arif Virani: I would need to consult with my officials and get back to you on that. I'm not sure if my officials have the answer to that.

● (0845)

Hon. Marco Mendicino: If you can do that, Minister, it would be very much appreciated. Thank you for your answers.

I'll yield the rest of my time to the Chair.

The Chair: Thank you very much. It's much appreciated.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin, you have the floor for six minutes.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Thank you, Chair.

Thank you for being here, Minister.

I have several questions running through my head, but I'll have to prioritize them. I wish I had more time, but I understand that's the way it has to be done.

First, I have some questions about the legal aid system for immigrants and refugees. I'm sure you understand that this issue is of great concern to the Bloc Québécois. In Quebec, the amount owed by the federal government is a problem. In fact, the Quebec government is not getting paid, yet it continues to spend on newcomers.

There's also the question of official languages. A total of $1.2 million has been earmarked for official languages and I'm interested in hearing how that money will be distributed among the provinces.

In addition, there's obviously the whole issue of systemic racism. You want to help judges impose sentences that take this into account. How is that going to work? How are we going to define systemic racism?

There's the question of cybersecurity, in courthouses, etc.

There are plenty of important issues, essential even, that I won't necessarily be able to address this morning, unfortunately. However, I will try.

There's also Bill C-63, which you told us about in your opening remarks. I'm not sure how it relates to the Supplementary Estimates (C), but it is an important question, regardless. With respect to this bill, I am curious as to why you didn't introduce the age verification process, as proposed by Senator Julie Miville-Dechêne. Her proposal seemed relatively wise to me, but there's no mention of it at all in Bill C-63.

The Bloc Québécois is in the same boat. We've proposed abolishing the two religious exceptions in the Criminal Code, which I think is essential in the current context. How is it possible that someone can still build their defence around the idea that they committed a hate crime or spread hatred because of a religious text? That is completely absurd and contrary to the values shared by all Quebeckers and, I'm certain, by the rest of Canada too.

These are all essential questions, but I'm going to focus on two important elements.

First, our committee recently passed a bill that aims to create a commission to review errors in the justice system. This is obviously something that had to be done; congratulations. I think it was high time for a major clean-up. The commission will comprise nine members. I've tabled an amendment to the effect that these nine commissioners should be bilingual. In fact, I'm a little surprised that this wasn't planned from the outset. Still, it seems a very modest goal. Nine bilingual commissioners across Canada shouldn't be too hard to achieve. However, I've run into an objection from some of my colleagues, including one of your Liberal colleagues.

I'd like to hear your thoughts on this. If we want the justice system to be bilingual, shouldn't we necessarily make an effort by asking for bilingualism among these nine commissioners? It's not as though there are 900 of them; there are nine.

Hon. Arif Virani: Thank you, Mr. Fortin.

As far as legal aid is concerned, we've moved—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: I'm sorry to interrupt, but I think you misunderstood. I said that these were subjects I would have liked to discuss. However, I've got about three minutes left and I'd like you to answer the question I asked you about the miscarriage of justice review commission.

Hon. Arif Virani: I'd just like to mention something quickly, Mr. Fortin.

In the last fiscal year, we've already paid out over $80 million for legal aid.

Also, our dedication to official languages is clear.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Minister—

Hon. Arif Virani: As for how the money is being distributed, you can ask my department.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: No. I asked just one question and it concerned the miscarriage of justice review commission, and the idea of having nine bilingual commissioners. Are you for or against it?

Hon. Arif Virani: We are definitely in favour of Bill C-40.

We were disappointed by the Conservatives' filibustering tactics during consideration of this bill, in terms of how cases or files are handled for persons who speak French. Of course, translation will still be part of this new commission's procedures. That will be helpful to complainants or people who want to request a review.

With respect to Bill S-210, I would like to point out something that is not true—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Mr. Minister, you're delivering a monologue.

I asked you a simple question: Do you support bilingualism for the nine members of the miscarriage of justice review commission, yes or no?

Honestly, I appreciate your work. You're an honest and serious person. I don't understand why you're evading my question this morning. If it embarrasses you, just say so and I'll move on to the next one.

● (0850)

Hon. Arif Virani: I'm an understanding person, Mr. Fortin. You raised a number of issues.

Very briefly, in terms of the situation—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: I said I would have liked to raise them, but I did not, Minister.

Hon. Arif Virani: The point I want to make about Bill S-210 is that Bill C-63 already contains age verification mechanisms. Furthermore, we must always protect the privacy rights of Canadians. In other words—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: We have 40 seconds left. Are you going to continue with your monologue, Minister? Please answer my question.

Hon. Arif Virani: —if we want to use an age verification mechanism—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Madam Chair, I'm relinquishing my turn to speak. I understand that the minister doesn't want to answer my question. I'll therefore yield my remaining 30 seconds to one of my colleagues, who may be able to get him to talk about topics we wanted to discuss this morning.

Thank you, Minister.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Hon. Arif Virani: May I continue, Madam Chair?

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: No. I didn't ask you about that, Minister.

Hon. Arif Virani: Madam Chair, may I continue to give my answer in the 20 seconds remaining?

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: No. My turn to speak should be mine. With all due respect, I am not interested in hearing the minister's monologue this morning.

[English]

The Chair: Okay. Mr. Garrison, I'm sure, will let the minister continue.

Mr. Garrison, please go ahead.

Mr. Randall Garrison (Esquimalt—Saanich—Sooke, NDP): No, I won't.

I want to thank the minister for his very clear presentation on Bill C-63.

I want to add two things to this discussion. One is that the loudest voices on this bill often do not include those who are most likely to be subjected to hate crime campaigns. When it comes before this committee, I'm looking forward to a diversity of witnesses who can talk about the real-world impacts that online hate has. We've seen it again and again. It's often well organized.

I stood outside the House of Commons and defended the rights of trans kids. Within one day, I had 700 emails with the same defamatory and hateful two-word phrase used to describe me. I am a privileged person. I have a staff. I have all the resources and support I need. However, when you think about what happens to trans kids and their families when they are subjected to these online hate crimes, it has very real consequences.

I'm looking forward to us being able to hear from diverse voices and, in particular, those who are most impacted. I know this is not really a question to you at this point.

We have other important work we've been doing in this committee. I want to turn to Bill C-332, which just passed this committee and was sent back to the House. This is the bill on controlling and coercive behaviour. This committee has been dealing with this topic for more than three years. One of the things that we quite clearly said was that the passage of this bill is a tool for dealing with the epidemic of intimate partner violence, but it's not the only tool.

I guess I'm asking two things here.

What other plans does the Department of Justice have to provide the necessary and associated supports for survivors of intimate partner violence?

What plans are there to do the educational work that will be necessary?

The bill says it will be proclaimed at a time chosen by cabinet. I'm assuming there will be a plan to get ready for this. I'm interested in what's going to happen with that plan. It has unanimous support, so I don't think it's premature to be asking about this at this point.

Hon. Arif Virani: Thank you, Mr. Garrison, for your leadership on the first part of what you talked about and the courage that you continue to show as a parliamentarian, and also for your leadership and that of Laurel Collins on coercive control.

In terms of supporting victims, we are constantly and actively thinking about how to better support victims, including victims of intimate partner violence. Please take a cue from what we did in Bill C-75 and in Bill C-48 with respect to the reverse onus on bail for survivors of intimate partner violence. Issues about support and funding are always on the table.

Also, please understand that when you talk about a 24-hour takedown of things like revenge porn, you're dealing with an aspect of coercive control that exists right now. That's in Bill C-63.

You also mentioned, in your opening, hearing from voices. I think two of the most salient voices that I heard from were the two that were at the press conference with me: Jane, the mother of a child who has been sexually abused and repeatedly exploited online, and Carla Beauvais, a woman who has been intimidated and has retreated from participating in the public space.

I would also suggest taking your cues from the groups that were also there beside me. The National Council of Canadian Muslims and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs have, in the last six months, not seen eye to eye on a lot of issues. On this bill, they do see eye to eye. They both support this, as do the special envoys on anti-Semitism and Islamophobia. Those are important voices to be hearing from, and that's what I will continue to do.

● (0855)

Mr. Randall Garrison: I want to continue a little bit on the question of legal aid when it comes to intimate partner violence. I know that quite often the answer is that it's really the responsibility of the provinces. What I'm looking for here is some commitment from the federal government with perhaps new pilot programs or new funding to encourage new programs in areas of intimate partner violence and support. The change in the law will mean that intimate partners will be involved in a criminal process but they will not be the defendants. Quite often there isn't legal assistance available for people who may face appearing in court in very difficult circumstances.

I'm looking for some leadership from the federal government on this, even though I recognize it's primarily a provincial responsibility.

Hon. Arif Virani: I think we both have a role to play in providing dollars. On-the-ground delivery is often administered by provinces. We've been quite strong in terms of our support for immigration and refugee legal aid and criminal legal aid. But I would reflect back on what the chair mentioned about targeted supports to Nova Scotia for racialized communities.

I strongly believe in supporting vulnerable people who are in need of legal aid assistance so, if there are proposals that are put before me about how we can address legal aid in an acute manner that helps women in the main who are dealing with intimate partner violence, I am all ears for that kind of discussion. I think those kinds of targeted supports are necessary to really fulfill the promise of ensuring that people's rights are vindicated.

Mr. Randall Garrison: Thank you, and we will follow up with you on that.

Mr. Van Popta opened with a question about confidence in the justice system in the appointment of judges. I think we all acknowledge the whole system has to do better in terms of filling judicial vacancies, and I do acknowledge your personal efforts to do that. But there's a second part to confidence in the justice system, and that is that people have confidence in the system when they see themselves represented in the system rather than just subjected to it.

I wonder if you could comment on the nature of the judicial appointments, and the progress that's being made, if it's being made, to make the judiciary reflect the face of Canada.

Hon. Arif Virani: I'm very happy to address this.

When we took office about 30% of the Conservative government's appointments had been women, and 53% of our appointments are women. When I came into office, the record of our government was about 11% racialized candidates being appointed. I have appointed 20% racialized candidates. I believe in a strong, highly intellectually competent bench, but also a bench that reflects the diversity of our country because I believe that helps ensure confidence in the administration of justice.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Minister.

Thank you, Mr. Garrison.

We will now commence with our second round.

We'll go to Mr. Moore for five minutes.

Hon. Rob Moore (Fundy Royal, CPC): Thank you, Chair.

Minister, we're here in the estimates today. You spent your entire opening remarks on a defence of Bill C-63. I recall your predecessor, Minister Lametti, when he was here. I asked him a question on the issue of MAID, when I think 25 constitutional experts said the minister's opinion on the matter was wrong. I asked the minister who was right, him or these 25 constitutional experts. And he said he was.

That kind of hubris is probably a good reason why he's not longer here and now you are, but we're starting to see that same thing on Bill C-63with yourself, when virtually everyone has come out and said this was an effort to trample down freedom of speech. Margaret Atwood described Bill C-63 as “Orwellian”. David Thomas, who was chairperson of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, said:

> The Liberal government's proposed Bill C-63, the online harms act, is terrible law that will unduly impose restrictions on Canadians' sacred Charter right to freedom of expression. That is what the Liberals intend. By drafting a vague law creating a draconian regime to address online “harms”, they will win their wars without firing a bullet.

There's a diverse group of people who feel that Bill C-63 is an outrageous infringement on Canadians' rights. We also see a government that will not stand up for the most vulnerable.

You had the opportunity, Minister, to introduce a bill that would have protected children, but your government, true to form, could not resist taking aim at their political opponents. This is not about hate speech, it's about speech that Liberals hate, and shutting that down.

Now Bill C-63, if it unfortunately were to pass, will too be struck down by the courts. If you were in a position to appeal it, I have no doubt you would. That brings me to my question on your government's radical agenda.

You've decided to file a number of appeals in recent court rulings. You've appealed a ruling that found the invocation of the Emergencies Act was unconstitutional. You appealed a ruling that found that the plastic bag ban and the plastic straw ban that Canadians hate so much was unconstitutional. You were quick to appeal those. But when the Supreme Court ruled the six-month minimum sentence for the crime of child luring was unconstitutional, you chose not to file an appeal.

Why is it that, when your government's radical agenda is challenged in the courts, you're quick to appeal, but when vulnerable Canadians' lives are at stake, you choose not to appeal?

● (0900)

Hon. Arif Virani: Mr. Moore, I disagree with pretty much everything you just said in terms of how you've characterized things. What I would say to you is to actually look at the constitutional record internationally.

We looked at France, Australia, Germany and England. In France, a takedown provision across all sets of content, including hatred content, was struck down as unconstitutional. That's specifically why we are not pursuing that. We have a takedown provision within 24 hours of child pornography and revenge porn. I hope we can agree on that, Liberals and Conservatives. We do not have an immediate takedown provision over other materials. That's the first point.

The second point is that you talked about the author Margaret Atwood. I have tremendous respect for Margaret Atwood. I've invited her into conversation about the nuances of this bill. She has a concern about freedom of expression. I share that concern. I'm duty-bound to uphold freedom of expression. I swore an oath to the Constitution. I'm the only cabinet minister who does. What we've done, through a careful approach, is to look at how we can calibrate the important need to keep Canadians safe and to protect liberty of expression.

If you had listened to Carla Beauvais at the press conference, you would have heard her talk about the fact that her own speech is being curtailed because she is so intimidated from participating in public discourse. We're trying to empower that public discourse.

There are safeguards in the bill that I would urge you to look at, about how Facebook makes its determinations in terms of ensuring that they respect freedom of speech, how the digital safety commissioner must ensure that non-discrimination occurs—

Hon. Rob Moore: Thank you, Minister.

Hon. Arif Virani: —and how courts would review these processes to ensure that liberty of expression is always maintained.

Hon. Rob Moore: Thank you, Minister.

Madam Chair, we'll have lots of time to debate Bill C-63 in the future. I think the verdict is coming out very quickly on that. I want to use what's left of my time to now move my motion regarding former minister David Lametti on the issue of ex-judge Delisle, where the minister ordered a new trial.

I'm moving that motion now, Madam Speaker.

The Chair: Thank you.

I recognize Mr. Maloney.

Mr. James Maloney (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Are you proposing to debate the motion now, Mr. Moore?

Hon. Rob Moore: Well, I'm assuming that there would be near unanimous support for it, in light of the stories coming out of Quebec right now about Minister Lametti ordering a new trial in the case of this judge who was found guilty of murder.

If it can pass by unanimous consent, or if we can have a vote on it now—

The Chair: Hold on.

Mr. Maloney, you have the floor.

Mr. James Maloney: Thank you, Madam Chair.

Given that the minister is here at the request of all parties, and with enthusiastic support from the opposition, I would move that we adjourn debate on this motion and get back to the issues at hand. We have not only the minister here; the officials are here as well. I think we should use the time we have to discuss the issues that we're here to discuss.

The Chair: Okay.

We need to take a vote on this—

[Translation]

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Madam Chair, may I intervene concerning Mr. Maloney's motion to adjourn the debate?

[English]

The Chair: No. We vote now.

[Translation]

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: We're actually voting on whether we want to adjourn debate on Mr. Moore's motion to allow the minister to answer our questions about the estimates and other matters, right?

The Chair: Yes, that's right.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: If the minister refuses to answer, can we return to Mr. Moore's motion?

The Chair: Ha, ha! No.

The first hour of the meeting, which we are spending with the minister, isn't over yet.

[English]

Would you like a recorded vote?

[Translation]

(Motion agreed to on division: Yeas 6; Nays 5)

● (0905)

The Chair: We will therefore continue with the minister.

Mrs. Brière, you have the floor for five minutes.

Mrs. Élisabeth Brière (Sherbrooke, Lib.): Thank you, Madam Chair.

Good morning, Minister. I'd like to thank you and your entire team for being with us this morning.

We are living in an increasingly divided world. Even though everyone is entitled to their own opinion, people are either for or against different issues. We are quick to put people into categories, to see them as being on one side or another and slap labels on them. In this increasingly complex world, and perhaps as my previous role taught me, I think it would help if people were more caring, attentive and open to each other.

In your opening remarks, you referred to Bill C-63, which aims to protect children online. We have been hearing a lot about this bill. I have two questions for you.

First, do you believe that the definition of “hate speech” in Bill C-63 will really make it possible to achieve the goal of protecting children online?

Second, the bill seems to apply pre-emptively, even before a person has said or done anything. I wonder if you could tell me your thoughts on that.

Hon. Arif Virani: Thank you, Mrs. Brière.

I would like to underscore one thing, since you've raised the same topic as Mr. Moore.

[English]

Online hatred has real-world consequences. Again, talk to the Afzaal family and to the families of the six men who were killed at the Quebec mosque. Talk to them in terms of those real-world consequences.

Second, Conservatives seem to be operating in this make-believe world where hatred isn't already regulated in Canada. We have sections 318 and 319 of the Criminal Code. Those have been upheld in Canada as reasonable limitations on speech because hatred is not protected in this country.

The proposition we are bringing forward is this: If hatred is not protected in the real world, why should it be protected in the online world? That is where we have a difference of opinion, Mr. Moore, and I think it's something that you need to address for yourselves in terms of trying to understand why groups like the NCCM and CIJA are behind this bill. It's because they want to see a curb on that very hatred.

With respect to your question, Madam Brière, of whether the hatred definition will help to protect children, absolutely it will. Again, this is not my definition. This is the definition entrenched by the Supreme Court of Canada. I didn't make it up. The Prime Minister didn't make it up. The courts have already established this definition. That's the definition that we use, and it will keep kids safe as they move into adulthood because we need to keep everyone safe. It's not just about targeting children.

I'll point out for Mr. Moore's edification that Australia moved on children alone in 2015. Nine years later, it's moved much beyond that. That's important to understand—that the whole world is moving in that direction, including Conservatives in Britain. I'm just puzzled why Conservatives here are afraid to do so.

Lastly, Madam Brière, you asked me about prevention and the notion of prevention assisting against hate. This is a very important question. We already have, in certain defined circumstances where reasonable grounds can be made, the ability to effect a thing like a peace bond to prevent harm against a woman facing domestic violence. That includes preventative restrictions on speech, prior restraint of speech.

What am I talking about? I'm talking about a man estranged from his former wife who cannot, because of a peace bond, post revenge porn about her. In certain circumstances, we allow this. We know this is significant. That's why we've injected in this legislation the safeguard of getting the local attorney general's consent. That is critical because it serves as that safeguard to ensure that this is not used in a manner that is overly restricted, and that it will be found constitutional.

Thank you.

[Translation]

Mrs. Élisabeth Brière: Thank you very much.

I would like to discuss a completely different topic—the appointment of judges—even though I know you answered a question along those lines earlier.

In my riding, we are still awaiting the appointment of certain judges. I'd like you to tell me what work you're going to accomplish on this matter in the coming weeks or months.

● (0910)

Hon. Arif Virani: Mrs. Brière, the work is still ongoing. I've added people to my team and I'm working closely with my deputy minister, the departments and the Privy Council. As I mentioned, I've already contacted the judicial advisory committees and sent a letter saying that this was one of my top priorities.

I'd like to point out that, in seven months, I've already appointed over 64 judges, and that other appointments will be made in the coming days. Because the matter is extremely important, I'll keep working hard on this file, with two objectives in mind. First, we have to appoint the most intelligent lawyers possible, who also have an excellent knowledge of the law. Second, we must ensure that the judiciary reflects our nation's diversity, particularly by appointing women, like you, Mrs. Brière.

Mrs. Élisabeth Brière: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mrs. Brière.

I now give the floor to Mr. Fortin for two and a half minutes.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

Minister, with all due respect, you didn't have time to answer my question earlier. I'll just ask it again. I'd like a quick answer, ideally yes or no, because we only have two and a half minutes.

Are you for or against a bilingualism requirement for the nine commissioners to be appointed to the miscarriage of justice review commission under Bill C-40, that this committee has just passed?

Hon. Arif Virani: I support the bill and I agree that people must be understood in the official language they use during such a process. Translation will make this possible.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Saying that people must be understood in their language is a rather vague statement.

My question is simple: Are you for or against these nine members being bilingual?

Hon. Arif Virani: I support the bill. I'm against the Conservatives' filibustering—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Why are you refusing to answer my question?

Hon. Arif Virani: I support bilingualism and the fact that people must be understood when they make a speech or appear before the commission.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: I'm in favour of apple pie too, Minister. There's no doubt about that.

However, I think my question is simple enough. I have to admit that I was very surprised to find myself in a situation where your Conservative colleagues supported my request, which is clearly a matter of a common sense, to use an expression that's become a little tired these days. Indeed, common sense dictates that the nine commissioners should speak and understand French and English. I don't think it's unreasonable to find nine bilingual commissioners among tens of millions of Canadian citizens.

You're dancing around my question. Furthermore, one member of your party has opposed my request, as basic as it is. Everyone in Quebec agrees with this proposal, and the same is probably true for most people elsewhere in Canada.

Minister, before my time expires, I'm going to ask you my question about bilingualism within the commission one last time. Do you agree, yes or no, that the nine commissioners should speak and understand French and English?

Hon. Arif Virani: We are strongly support bilingualism. We enacted new legislation on official languages in Canada—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Thank you, Madam Chair. Unfortunately, the minister's sales pitch—

Hon. Arif Virani: We want people—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: —with all due respect, doesn't interest me this morning.

Thank you.

Hon. Arif Virani: We want everyone to be properly understood by the commission.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: My time is up, and I'd like the minister to stop there.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Fortin and Minister Virani.

[English]

Mr. Garrison, you have two and a half minutes, please.

Mr. Randall Garrison: We are eagerly awaiting the passage of the miscarriage of justice act because of its disproportionate impacts on some communities, including indigenous communities, in Canada.

What Mr. Fortin continues to ignore is that an absolute requirement of bilingualism is in place for the commission. Imposing that on all nine commissioners would mean that well-qualified people who speak a first nations language plus one of the other official languages in Canada would be excluded from appointments, if his hard and fast rule were applied.

I want to ask more generally on that question about the progress being made on the recommendations—the calls to justice—about the missing and murdered indigenous women. There are 231 calls in the areas for which you're responsible as a minister. There has been some criticism that the result has been mostly committees and very little hard action to address those concerns.

Can you speak about the progress that's being made in the area of justice?

● (0915)

Hon. Arif Virani: Thank you, Mr. Garrison, for the question highlighting a very important subject.

With respect to MMIWG, those 230-plus calls to action are being worked on, particularly the ones in our jurisdiction. We are working diligently on all aspects of it. The UNDA action plan speaks to that. I think the work we're doing with respect to intimate partner violence and reverse onus on bail also speaks to that.

On the issue of the miscarriage of justice commission, I would return to what I said when I was here. We have a situation where we've overturned about 27 cases in 20 years. The Brits have done 500 cases in the same time span. That's statistically improbable. It's not because their system is inferior to ours; it's because we're not finding the cases.

Twenty-two of those 27 cases were white men. We know that statistically there is overrepresentation of indigenous and Black persons in our justice system. We're going to find those cases and we're going to find them with a robust commission.

Mr. Randall Garrison: Once again, I want to draw attention to real-world consequences. The delays we've had in getting this up and running mean that people who are likely not guilty of anything are continuing to serve sentences, whether that's in custody or in the community. By the delays we're having with passing legislation and getting it set up, we're perpetuating injustices. I wonder if you would agree with me that this is a serious concern.

Hon. Arif Virani: I think it's an extremely serious concern. I find it quite flabbergasting that it has become a partisan matter about keeping an innocent man or woman in prison. That should never be partisan. Again, I would say to you that, if other countries are able to overcome partisanship on such a basic fundamental premise, we should be able to as well. It's unfortunate that we are not able to.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Do you have any concluding remarks, Minister?

Hon. Arif Virani: My concluding remarks would be, with respect to Bill S-210 proposed by Senator Miville-Dechêne, that there are very legitimate questions that relate to privacy interests. We need to understand that age verification and age-appropriate design features are entrenched in Bill C-63, something that Monsieur Fortin seemed to misunderstand.

Second, the idea of uploading the age-verification measure such as one's government ID is something that has been roundly criticized, including by people like law enforcement, who'd be concerned about what that kind of privacy disclosure would do in terms of perpetuating financial crimes against Canadians.

What we need to be doing here is keeping Canadians safe by ensuring that their age-appropriate design measures have been informed by a conversation between law enforcement, government and the platforms themselves. There are examples of how to do this, and we're keen to work on those examples and to get this important bill into this committee so we can debate the best ways forward.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you for those concluding remarks.

As the chair, I'm especially looking forward to having that bill come before me, particularly as a previous, I guess, justice minister who dealt with it in Nova Scotia when a young girl committed suicide because of exactly what we will be dealing with here.

Thank you very much for those concluding remarks.

Thank you to the staff.

I'm going to suspend for a minute to allow you to take your leave, and then we will continue with our motion.

● (0915)

(Pause)

● (0920)

The Chair: As we're getting ready to start with the motion, I just want to let all members know that, following up on the meeting with the Norwegian standing committee on justice members, the suggestion is that we meet them the next time we meet on Monday, which is the date they wanted, Monday, April 8, from 11:45 to 1:00. We will let you know which room that is taking place in.

If that is agreeable to you, we would have to adopt a hospitality budget, which reads as follows:

> That the committee meet, in an informal meeting, with a delegation from the Committee of Justice of Norway on Monday, April 8, 2024, at 11:45 a.m.; and that the committee defray the hospitality expenses related to this meeting.

I remind you also that Ambassador Trine Jøranli Eskedal would like to invite all the committee to a reception in the Norwegian residence on Tuesday, April 9, in the evening.

Can I have somebody move the motion that I just read, if this is all acceptable to you all?

It is moved by Mr. Maloney and seconded by Mr. Van Popta.

(Motion agreed to)

The Chair: Thank you very much.

I'm now going to go to Mr. Housefather on the motion we have before us.

Mr. Anthony Housefather (Mount Royal, Lib.): Thank you so much, Madam Chair.

Thank you to my fellow committee members.

The motion I want to put forward is the one we have in front of us:

> That pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) and in view of the alarming escalation of antisemitism in Canada, the committee undertake a study on the issue of antisemitism and the additional measures that could be taken to address the valid fears that are being expressed by Canada's Jewish community.
> That the study include but not be limited to the issue of antisemitism on university campuses.
> That the study should be at least three meetings and that the committee report its findings to the House.

Madam Chair, briefly, I had a chance on Monday to deliver a speech in the House that dealt very much with this issue. The Jewish community in Canada is feeling frightened to a level I have never seen. While, anecdotally, people are taking mezuzahs off doors and are afraid to send their kids to school, the vast majority of Jewish Canadians are affected in a broader way. Those are anecdotal, small incidents. I don't think that's happening much. What is happening is people expressing their fears to me and wondering if they're safe in this country and have a future in this country, which I never in my life believed would happen in Canada.

I don't see that anywhere near as much, frankly, when I'm in the United States. Something is happening here. Anti-Semitism is happening around the world, but the perception of the community in Canada is drastically different from what I find south of the border. I think the committee needs to look into what is happening and what we can do.

I'm going to talk about two issues very briefly, which I think are the most poignant and important ones.

One of these is the demonstrations happening, and the lack of policing related to those demonstrations. People are blocking buildings, shouting things deemed to be hateful and intimidating people entering or leaving a building, and the police are not moving people back so that there's a safe line that allows for a differentiation between the people trying to enter or leave and the protesters. That's one thing. Why are Jewish buildings a target in Canada, and how is this making people feel? I would like the opportunity to hear from Jewish Canadians and Jewish organizations about how they feel and what they think we could do as federal legislators to better protect them from a public safety aspect, a justice aspect, etc.

The second issue is what's on campus. The biggest places where you find people feeling scared and intimidated are campuses. This is happening from Newfoundland to British Columbia. It's happening in my province of Quebec. It's happening in Ontario. It's happening everywhere. Some colleagues and I wrote a letter, in December, to the presidents of the biggest universities in Canada. We have received responses from all of them, which we can table. I think we need to hear from Universities Canada and the presidents of universities on what they're doing to protect Jewish students, and we need to hear from Jewish students regarding what they're experiencing on campus. Then we can opine on what solutions we might be able to recommend to the universities and the minister.

That being said, the most important thing is this: Symbolically, the Jewish community has failed to see leadership at the federal, provincial and municipal levels—from literally everyone. I think, if they see that our committee is interested in this issue, that there is a forum for them and that we are taking their concerns seriously and listening to them, it would be a morale boost because they will think that at least someone cares and there's hope.

I'm hoping that my colleagues will agree to do this study. Of course, I'm happy to listen to amendments and yield the floor.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

● (0925)

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Housefather.

Mr. Mendicino.

Hon. Marco Mendicino: Madam Chair, thank you.

I obviously wholeheartedly support my colleague Mr. Housefather's motion. While he is true in all aspects of his remarks, I would add one important caveat, in that there has been a tremendous demonstration of leadership on the part of Anthony Housefather on behalf of his community in the face of some of the most vile hate that I have ever seen, certainly in my lifetime, in a way that I hope that his community will take some hope and inspiration from.

I would just add that in Toronto, my hometown, the police chief there, Chief Demkiw, just reported 48 hours ago that Toronto has seen a 93% increase in the number of reported hate crimes since October 7, 2023, and that compounds the ongoing rising tide of anti-Semitism, which I think parliamentarians, regardless of partisan stripe, have an obligation to deal head-on with.

I would also say that the anecdotes that Mr. Housefather referred to are the same stories that I hear from the community that I represent in Eglinton—Lawrence. The fear, the profound sense of anxiety and, most of all, the deep sense of abandonment that the Jewish community is feeling not only in Canada but around the world in the face of this hate should be a red flag and should sound the alarm for all of us.

There are many things that we need to do in order to push back against this, but I think that having a study that examines carefully some of the issues that Mr. Housefather has already highlighted is one way in which I believe this committee can contribute, and if we don't take this opportunity, I think it will see us take more steps backwards as a democracy.

I certainly hope that all members of this committee will see the value in putting some energy into this report so that we can come together to stem this trend and to reverse it and to continue to see Jewish Canadians and all Canadians live in a society that is free from hate.

Thank you.

The Chair: Next is Ms. Gladu, please.

Ms. Marilyn Gladu (Sarnia—Lambton, CPC): Thank you, Chair.

I just want to say that I also am extremely concerned about the rise of anti-Semitism in the country. We just had the justice minister here telling us that we already have hate laws, hate speech laws, but people are calling “death to Jews” across the country and not a single charge has been filed.

I'm quite alarmed, when I see the protests, the violence and the targeting of Jewish businesses, that the reaction from the police is not the same as it is in.... We've just seen a fishers' protest going on. The police are there making sure that the protest remains peaceful and are bringing in their horses, but here in Ottawa when we're having pro-Palestinian demonstrations and they're calling out things that are anti-Semitic and kicking in cars and breaking off mirrors, the police are standing by and doing nothing. What is the point of having federal law if you don't have the enforcement of law?

I think that this has come to a crisis point, and I'm very supportive of doing a study to figure out what exactly we can do to use the existing laws and enforce them, and what else we can add to that, because Jews don't feel safe in this country. I'm alarmed at the demise of what was Canada: a free nation where people could feel safe and worship. I think people don't feel safe, and we need to address it.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms. Gladu.

[English]

Next is Mr. Van Popta.

Mr. Tako Van Popta: Thank you, Madam Chair.

Thank you to Mr. Housefather for your courage in standing up for the Jewish community and putting forward this motion. I think it's a very important study, and I support that we undertake that.

In my home province of British Columbia, at my university, the University of British Columbia, there was a referendum or a threat of one recently to terminate the lease that Hillel House has had on campus for many years. It's a very significant presence in the university. It is a haven for the Jewish student body there. Thankfully, the referendum didn't go ahead, with the good leadership of the student association; but just the fact that the referendum was even suggested, I think, has been very disturbing for not only people in my home province of British Columbia but throughout the country.

The motion also would have included BDS sanctions—boycott, divestment and sanctions—against Israel and anything to do with Israel, and that's just the newest form of anti-Semitism. I find it all very disturbing.

I'm very supportive of having this study to better understand what is going on here in Canada with anti-Semitism, which is something I never thought I would see in my lifetime, and also to demonstrate to the Jewish community that we stand with them and that they are an important part of Canadian culture.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Van Popta.

Mr. Moore.

Hon. Rob Moore: Thank you, Madam Chair. We've had this motion before us for quite some time, and I think it should be a concern for all Canadians and all parliamentarians.

I'll speak briefly on, as Mr. Housefather was mentioning, the lawlessness around some of these protests and the fear that that's instilling in many Canadians. I can't imagine the fear that it would instill in Canada's Jewish community. Every Canadian, every person, should feel safe in Canada, and there's no place in Canada or anywhere in the world for anti-Semitism.

I think this motion is timely and important. I certainly support Mr. Housefather's motion.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Moore.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin, you have the floor.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Thank you, Madam Chair.

I'd like to begin by thanking Mr. Housefather for moving his motion. I think it expresses a concern that many of us share, more or less everywhere throughout Quebec and Canada.

Each and every person should be able to live out their religious beliefs in peace and freedom. I don't think that religious or moral beliefs, apostolic or otherwise, should divide people. Whatever the religion, it should be a set of values that brings people together, not divides them.

I have a great deal of respect, fondness and sympathy for members of the Jewish community, given what they're going through at the moment. I don't want to stray too far from the debate, but Quebec has a state secularism law. I've had discussions with many friends of the Jewish faith, as well as some of the Muslim faith. There are extremists in all faiths, but I would say that 99% of people agree that the state should be secular and that everyone should be able to practice their religion in peace, respect and solidarity.

I don't have anything to add to the debate, but I would like to say that I agree with what Mr. Housefather and Mr. Mendicino have said. These things are important.

You can count on the support of the Bloc Québécois on these issues.

● (0935)

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Fortin.

[English]

Mr. Garrison.

Mr. Randall Garrison: Thank you, Madam Chair. I, too, would like to commend Mr. Housefather for his tireless work against anti-Semitism and bringing the attention of this committee and all of Parliament to the rise of anti-Semitism. I have seen the evidence of this in my own constituency and again on campus at two educational institutions that I've been long associated with in my community. Jewish students have approached me saying they no longer feel safe just being on campus, not in doing anything on campus, and I have an extreme level of concern about this. I am completely supportive of this study.

However, I take very seriously what Mr. Housefather said about leadership, and a necessity for providing leadership, so I am going to propose an amendment to his motion, not to diminish in any way the study of anti-Semitism, but for our committee to provide the same leadership with the parallel rise of Islamophobia in this country.

On my proposed amendment, I have a text in both official languages. I will read the technical...and we have a version as it would read. I think my staff will give it to the clerk at this point.

The Chair: Please proceed.

Mr. Randall Garrison: The proposal would expand the number of sessions from three to six, so that we can devote an equal amount of time to the rise of Islamophobia in Canada and provide leadership on opposing all forms of religious-based hatred in this country.

The technical amendment has five parts. It would add “and Islamophobia” after each mention of anti-Semitism on line two. It would add “and” before “additional measures” on line three. It would replace the text on line four with “Canada's Jewish and Muslim communities.” It would add “and Islamophobia” after “anti-semitism” on line five. Finally, it would replace the number of meetings from “three” to “six” on line seven.

We have the final version as it would read. I think that's easier for people to deal with. It's really only adding the parallel study of Islamophobia to the study of anti-Semitism.

With that, I move my amendment, Madam Chair.

The Chair: We're going to suspend the meeting for two or three minutes. That seems to be the best move, while everyone's reading it and taking a look at it.

Thank you.

● (0940)

_____(Pause)_____

● (0945)

The Chair: I call the meeting back to order.

We're now speaking on the amendment.

Mr. Housefather, I will commence with you.

Mr. Anthony Housefather: Thank you, Madam Chair.

I appreciate Mr. Garrison's amendment. Of course, Islamophobia is also a very important form of hate, but they are two very distinct and separate forms of hate, so I want to make sure that it is clear that the meetings that we're going to have on one versus the other and the report that we're going to do are going to be clear that we're doing something on anti-Semitism and something on Islamophobia and that they're not two tropes that are together. Too many times, people feel that one is equal to the other, and when an act of anti-Semitism occurs, they feel necessary to mention Islamophobia in the same breath and vice versa. In the same way, anti-Black racism is not the same as anti-gay racism. They are all different tropes, so my proposal would be to subamend Mr. Garrison's amendment to add the following words.

It would now read, in line two, “Undertake a study on the issue of anti-Semitism and”, and add the words, “a study on the issue of Islamophobia”. I'm adding the words “a study on the issue of” after the end of line two.

In line five at the beginning of the second paragraph, we would replace the word “study”, the third word, with “independent studies”. Then, on line seven at the beginning of the third paragraph, instead of saying “that the study”, it should say “that each study”. Then, instead of “that it should be at least six meetings”, it would be “that each study should be at least two meetings”. I've heard from colleagues that six meetings means that we're not studying anything else for a prolonged period of time, so instead of three meetings each, it would be two meetings each: two meetings on anti-Semitism and two meetings on Islamophobia.

Then, “that the committee report its findings on both studies”. So, after the word “findings”, it would be “on both studies to the House”.

Thank you, Madam Chair and Mr. Clerk.

● (0950)

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin, I apologize for not having drafted this in French, but I can give you the—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: No, that's fine.

Mr. Anthony Housefather: Okay, thank you.

The Chair: Yes, we understand.

[English]

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: I calculate it as anti-francophonia.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Chair: Does anyone on the committee need to have it reread, or did you follow that?

[Translation]

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: It might be a good idea to reread the text, please.

Could you read it again, Mr. Clerk, to make sure we're all working from the same version?

The Chair: Okay.

Could you do that, Mr. Clerk?

The Clerk of the Committee (Mr. Jean-François Lafleur): Yes, of course, Mr. Fortin.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

I'll read it first in English, because that's the original language in which the amendment was drafted. I'll then try to read it in French.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: It's Canada's official language, I think.

The Clerk: The subamendment would therefore apply at the end of the second line.

[English]

At the end of line two, if I start after the comma, “the committee undertake a study on the issue of antisemitism and”, and we introduce the subamendment here, “a study on the issue of Islamophobia”. Then we continue the text.

The second amendment is on line five. It says, “that the independent studies include but not be limited”. That's the second part of the subamendment. The rest of the second paragraph reads as is.

The third part of the subamendment—

[Translation]

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: I just want to make sure I understand the fifth line correctly.

[English]

It's “That the independent study include”, correct?

[Translation]

The Clerk: It simply adds the word “independent” before “study”, and changes “study” to the plural. That's what this does.

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Okay, but it appears a little further on in the same sentence.

[English]

Is it “include but not be limited to the issue of antisemitism and independent study on Islamophobia”?

[Translation]

Are there any changes to the second time it's mentioned?

The Clerk: No. Now I no longer have it in front of me, but—

Mr. Rhéal Éloi Fortin: Okay. I thought that's where it was.

The Clerk: While we're at it, Mr. Housefather, when you say “independent studies”, you're talking about the fact that these two studies will be independent, not other theoretical studies, right?

● (0955)

Mr. Anthony Housefather: I'm talking about the fact that we're going to have two meetings on anti-Semitism and two completely separate meetings on Islamophobia. We'll prepare a report on anti-Semitism and a separate report on Islamophobia, and then table them in the House for a response.

The Clerk: So you're talking about the two studies that will be undertaken by the committee, and not about existing theoretical studies.

Mr. Anthony Housefather: Yes, I'm talking about the two studies mentioned here. This is just to clarify that they will be independent of one another.

The Clerk: Okay, perfect.

The Chair: I understand. Now we've written it down. I think everyone understands, right?

[English]

Mr. Maloney.

Mr. James Maloney: I would only add that maybe we should include the word “consecutive” so that they go one after the other. That way you don't complete one and then interrupt it with something else. They should go one after the other.

The Chair: There would be two meetings and two meetings.

Mr. James Maloney: There would be four consecutive meetings, yes.

The Chair: Yes, that's the intent.

Mr. James Maloney: It's the intent, but it doesn't say that as amended.

The Chair: Okay, “each study should be at least two meetings, for a total of four consecutive meetings, and that the committee report its findings on both studies to the House.” We're adding “for a total of four consecutive meetings”.

I'm receiving nods from everybody; everybody seems to be in agreement.

Ms. Gladu, you have your hand up.

Ms. Marilyn Gladu: Yes, Madam Chair.

I recognize that Islamophobia is certainly continuing to be an issue in the country, but I would like to just point out that there was a significant study on it after M-103. The Senate also completed a study. The Canadian government did a summit with many recommendations.

At the same time, I don't want to exclude other religions. We know there have been 80 Christian churches torched, pastors locked up without bail. The Hindu community has reached out to me to let me understand that they are receiving hate speech and death threats.

So, while all religions appear to be under attack, I don't want to dilute Mr. Housefather's original motion that talks about the crisis we're facing right now with the rise of anti-Semitism. You know, it's rising by as much as 700% in some places. There are violent crimes; people are unsafe.

I'll defer to the will of the committee, but I do think that has to be the priority.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms. Gladu.

Mr. Moore.

Hon. Rob Moore: Thank you, Madam Chair.

We have a number of studies that have been proposed by members around the table, one of which—and I think it's a very important one—is the study proposed by Mr. Housefather dealing with anti-Semitism.

I'm prepared to support his study without any amendment. I think the original motion is one that was brought to us some time ago. It's kind of in the queue with other studies that have been proposed. If other people want to have other studies on other issues, they're welcome to bring those forward for consideration by the committee.

In light of Mr. Housefather's willingness to get consensus around the table, I am happy to also support his amended version. I'll note that it gives us one less day to study anti-Semitism, but I think it's a goodwill effort for us to not monopolize all the remaining time left on studies when there are others that are in the queue that are also important.

I do want to make it clear that I'm happy to support Mr. Housefather's original motion that we study anti-Semitism, but I'm also willing to support this amended and subamended motion as currently written.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Moore.

Mr. Maloney, go ahead, please.

Mr. James Maloney: Thank you, Madam Chair.

I want to pick up on something Mr. Mendicino said earlier.

I want to add my voice and thank Mr. Housefather for being a strong, vocal leader on the issue.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. James Maloney: I would add that I would also like to thank Mr. Mendicino for the same reason, because he's been right by Mr. Housefather's side, along with all of us on this issue.

I fully support the original motion proposed by Mr. Housefather. I also agree with Mr. Garrison's amendment. I think both issues need to be addressed by this committee. I think the proposed amendment—and I want to thank Mr. Housefather for his willingness to compromise on the number of meetings—is an elegant solution to address the concerns raised by all. The “four consecutive meetings” component eliminates any concern people have with respect to not being able to address both issues.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

● (1000)

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Maloney.

I will just alert you all that it's 10:01. We want to conclude with this, but there are going to be three votes on this one. We have a bit of a steering committee scheduled, as well.

Mr. Fast, please go ahead.

Hon. Ed Fast (Abbotsford, CPC): Madam Chair, as a non-permanent member of this committee, I want to add my voice in support of the motion Mr. Housefather brought forward and the very legitimate concerns he's raised. I want to commend him for his passionate, appropriate speech in the House of Commons this week, where he articulated the fears and threats that are part of Jewish life in Canada today. This is not a Canada that I grew up with. It shouldn't be the Canada we have going forward. I hope this study will allow us to identify alternatives to address this very pernicious problem within our society.

I will also be speaking at an event in support of the Jewish community this Sunday in Vancouver. I want to assure Mr. Housefather that I will be sharing his concerns at that event.

I support the elegant solution Mr. Maloney suggested, which has been presented to this committee: Conduct, effectively, two studies—one on Islamophobia and one on anti-Semitism. However, I also want to articulate my strong support for the original motion Mr. Housefather brought forward.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much to all committee members. I very much appreciate the comments.

I'm now going to ask that we vote on the subamendment by Mr. Housefather.

Mr. James Maloney: Can we read it, so we understand perfectly what it says now?

The Chair: Yes. The subamendment is to say, “for a total of four consecutive meetings”.

Mr. Anthony Housefather: There's much more to it than that.

The Chair: How about I read the whole thing?

> That pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) and in view of the alarming escalation of antisemitism and Islamophobia in Canada, the committee undertake a study on the issue of antisemitism and a study on the issue of Islamophobia, and the additional measures that could be taken to address the valid fears that are being expressed by Canada's Jewish and Muslim communities.
> That the independent studies include but not be limited to the issue of anti-semitism and Islamophobia on university campuses;
> That each study should be at least two meetings for a total of four consecutive meetings; that the committee report its findings on both studies to the House; and that the committee request a government response to these reports.

Mr. Anthony Housefather: Mr. Garrison is suggesting we pass it on division.

(Subamendment agreed to on division)

The Chair: Now I'm going to ask for a vote on the amendment as amended.

Does it pass on division?

● (1005)

Mr. Anthony Housefather: I think everybody is in favour of that.

(Amendment as amended agreed to [See Minutes of Proceedings])

The Chair: It's unanimous.

Now we're on the main motion as amended.

(Motion as amended agreed to [See Minutes of Proceedings])

The Chair: That is passed unanimously.

Thank you very much.

I do have to say the following. We request that witness names be sent as soon as possible, up to and including Thursday, April 4. This will allow enough time for the clerk in the weeks that we're not here.

Mr. Randall Garrison: I'm sorry, Madam Chair. This is predetermined by the steering committee—

The Chair: I guess now we'll deal with scheduling.

Okay, that's fine. I assumed that we would be scheduling it as soon as we return, but I suppose we could deal with that at the steering committee level.

Having no other committee business, I will now adjourn and wish everybody a safe rest of today, a safe tomorrow and a safe time when you all go back to your constituencies with your loved ones.

Happy Palm Sunday.

Happy Naw-Rúz.

Happy so many things that are going on and Happy Easter and everything else.

I would ask the members who are on the steering committee to please stay. We will have a 10-minute in camera meeting.

Thank you very much.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

MEMBERS: The Honourable Otto Lang, P.C., Q.C., Chairman
Mr. E. Sydney Jackson
Mr. Paul E. Martin
Mrs. M.L. Basta, Secretary

TERMS OF REFERENCE

On April 6, 1983, the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, appointed the members of the first triennial Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, as required by a 1981 amendment to the Judges Act. The terms of reference of the Commission are as follows:

> The Commission shall, pursuant to Section 19.3 of the Judges Act inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally.
> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the Commission shall inquire into and report upon the following matters:
> 1. The adequacy of allowances paid under the Act, and their relationship to judges' salaries and benefits.
> 2. The adequacy of allowances paid under the Act, and more particularly >   a) allowances for incidental expenditures and non-accountable allowances paid pursuant to Section 20 of the Act;
>   b) removal allowances paid pursuant to Section 21.1 of the Act; and >   c) conference allowances paid pursuant to Section 22 of the Act.
> 3. Sabbatical or educational leaves of absence for judges.
> 4. The granting of annuities pursuant to Subsection 23(1) of the Act.
> 5. The adequacy of Section 20.3 of the Act pertaining to the election of a chief justice or chief judge to cease to perform the duties of a chief justice or chief judge as the case may be.
> The Commission shall report to the Minister of Justice upon the results of the inquiry in accordance with Subsection 19.3(2) of the Act.

Pursuant to the statutory conditions set out in Section 19.3, the Commission is required to report to the Minister of Justice within six months of its appointment. The Minister is thereafter required to place its report before Parliament within ten sitting days.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES

The Commission believes the position of judge in our society and in our political framework to be unique and vital. A free and independent judiciary is the single greatest guarantee of our constitutional rights and liberties. Under the Canadian Constitution, the judiciary exercises its authority independently of the executive and the legislature. The Constitution Act itself evidences this intent, by fixing the power to appoint the judges of the superior, district and county courts of the provinces upon the Governor General, and by imposing the duty upon Parliament to fix and provide their salaries, pensions and allowances.

The place of the judiciary has increased in importance in the light of recent constitutional developments in Canada, particularly the enactment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The judiciary also plays a greater role in shaping our lives because of the growing complexity of our social and economic relationships. The independence of the judiciary is part and parcel of their unique position. For this reason, the salaries and benefits of judges must continue to be dealt with by Parliament and only by Parliament, in a manner both as to amount and as to debate which respects judicial independence.

Parliament should fix judicial salaries and benefits in a manner and in an amount which ensures financial security for a judge and his family. The level of salary and benefits should also be such that the most able members of the practising bar may be induced to accept appointment to the bench without being expected to accept a major reduction in their standard of living. The office of judge has attached to it security, public service, the power to contribute to legal development and prestige. That prestige might not persist in full, however, should a marked difference in the level of remuneration of lawyers and judges continue, particularly if this were perceived to be a major factor in leading many able counsel to refuse appointment to the bench.

It must be remembered too, that the office of judge has constraints upon it in regard to many social and economic activities which the rest of us take for granted. The Dorfman Committee, reporting to the Minister of Justice in November 1978, said in this context:

> He must devote himself exclusively to his judicial duties. He may not, as may others, supplement his income by engaging directly or indirectly in any form of business activity or speculative venture. He is required to exercise self-imposed restraints in the market place, and must avoid all manner of extra-judicial private or public disputes or involvements. He is deprived of the right to vote. He must refrain from being a litigant. He may not participate in any tax shelter or other method of lessening the burden of taxation that is available to other members of the public. He should not be a landlord nor a lessor of goods. He may express no opinion concerning, nor endeavour to influence, the taxation or spending policies of any level of government. Even after retirement he will be precluded, for ethical reasons, from returning to practice as a barrister.

Clearly the office carries serious limitations upon it. It is against this background that the Commission has considered judges' salaries and benefits.

SUBMISSIONS TO THE COMMISSION

The Commission would here like to acknowledge the representations made to it by interested individuals and the formal submissions made by the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and the Canadian Judges Conference (supported by the Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice), the Special Committee of the Canadian Bar Association, and Mr. Justice T.D. Marshall on behalf of the northern judges. The Commission also had available to it the reports of the Dorfman Committee in 1978, and of the de Grandpré Committee in 1981, both of which were valuable aids to the work of this Commission.

JUDICIAL SALARIES

The Commission accepts the principle that the salaries of the judiciary should be adequate to preserve the role, dignity and quality of Canada's judges, and to enable them to provide their families with a standard of living commensurate with their position in Canadian society. We wish to emphasize that the issue of judicial salaries should not be addressed as though judges were subject to the conditions of service of federal government employees. It is our view that the judiciary are public servants in the highest sense, and that their salaries, pensions and allowances should reflect the esteem in which they must be held.

We have considered a number of factors and bases for comparison in attempting to formulate what we feel is a proper level of remuneration for the judiciary. In so doing, we have had the assistance of extensive briefs and representations by the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and the Canadian Judges Conference, and by the Special Committee of the Canadian Bar Association. We have also examined current levels of compensation for senior public servants and members of Parliament, and the data available on the income levels of the Canadian legal profession. For further comparison, we have examined income data for the judiciary in the United States and in the United Kingdom, as it relates to the income of senior public servants and legal practitioners in both nations.

After examining this material, we have concluded that the most appropriate basis for comparison is with the salaries or incomes of members of the legal profession of comparable experience, and with the salaries of senior deputy ministers.

It is the Commission's view that the salary of a superior court judge should bear a reasonably close relationship to that of an above average lawyer, because it is the above average lawyer who should be attracted to the bench. This does not mean that we consider that judges should be totally recompensed for their notional loss of income from legal practice. While judges are precluded from obtaining the financial benefits and perquisites which they might expect as senior practitioners, they also avoid the problems, financial and managerial, involved in the operation of a modern law practice. What we do advocate is establishing a salary figure which is not totally disproportionate with that which senior members of the bar may reasonably expect to derive from their legal practices, while at the same time recognizing that the satisfaction to be derived from public service is both an incentive to judicial office and an incalculable part of judicial compensation.

The submission of the Canadian Bar Association also reminded us of the words of the Honourable R.B. Bennett, K.C. (as he then was) in a 1927 article in the Canadian Bar Review:

> "...it is important that judges should be appointed to the Bench who are first of all men of experience and learning, men of character and men of worth, because the administration of justice has rightly been said once to be almost an attribute of the Godhead itself. Now if men enjoying large incomes have no ambition to go upon the Bench, it follows that you have to fall back upon the second line, and instead of appointing the best men to the judiciary, you have recourse to men of indifferent qualifications in their professions..."

We chose, therefore, to look at the third quartile income range of lawyers in Canada, as found in the Economic Survey of Canadian Law Firms 1982, commissioned by the Canadian Bar Association. We did not find this source fully satisfactory, since the response rate was only 6.32% and very few of the large firms participated, but it did appear clear that lawyers in the age group from 40 to 65, the prime years for judicial service, could also be expected to be earning their highest income in these years. Further, it appeared from statistics supplied by the Canadian Bar Association that lawyers' incomes in recent years have risen more rapidly than the Industrial Composite Index. Nor do these comparisons take into account the more stringent tax implications for a salaried person, as compared to the taxation of one who is self-employed.

Following is a table submitted to us by the Canadian Bar Association showing the 1981 income of lawyers by year of admission to the bar:

The minimum requirement for consideration for appointment to the bench is ten years of practice. According to this study, the average income of a lawyer in the third quartile, the standard we have adopted for purposes of comparison, was $95,269 for a practitioner who had just completed ten years at the bar. Judges are generally appointed from lawyers having 10 to 22 years at the bar. If reference is made to the more senior end of the scale in this quartile, reported income in 1981 was considerably higher. A superior court judge, in that same year, received a salary of $74,900. On the other hand, we are aware that the value of a judicial annuity must be weighed and that it constitutes a significant portion of total judicial compensation (See Appendix A). Nonetheless, the prospect of an annuity, which may or may not be realized for the reasons discussed later in this report, is not sufficient to compensate for salary deficiencies in the present. In any event, we know that the level of compensation has increasingly stood in the way of some top quality lawyers agreeing to become judges.

This view, and our opinion of the importance of the third quartile, would lead us to make recommendations for greater increases than we think can be made at one time. We are led to a more modest approach by the inadequacy of the statistical base (although we have received informal data on income levels which, if anything, would indicate that those set out in the Canadian Bar Association table err on the side of modesty), by the possibility that we may be looking at an income peak in 1981, in view of the economic recession and its impact upon at least some firms, and by the substantial value of judges' annuities.

In contrast, the salary situation up to 1975, particularly as brought up to date by Parliament in that year, was not considered a significant impediment to appointment. In its appearance before the Commission, the Joint Committee supported the conclusion that workable salary relationships had been achieved in that year. While we do not wish to relate judges' salaries to any in the public service on principle, it is worth noting that the historic relationship between the salaries of superior court judges and deputy ministers was restored in 1975, and has since deteriorated from the point of view of the judiciary: see Table 3, Brief of the Joint Committee, reproduced on page 6. The formula we propose to adopt would restore that relationship.

In the course of our inquiry, our attention was drawn to recent increases in the salary of the judiciary in the United Kingdom, which have provided British judges with substantial increments. In the U.K., the salaries of the higher judiciary are determined by the Lord Chancellor with the consent of the Minister for the Civil Service, pursuant to section 9 of the Administration of Justice Act 1973. Following is a comparison of the salaries of the judiciary with those of senior grades of the British civil service:

	Current Salary	Salary Aug.1/83	Salary Jan.1/84
Secretary of the Cabinet Permanent Secretary to Treasury	£42,000	45,000	48,000
Permanent Secretary	37,750	40,500	42,750
Second Permanent Secretary	35,000	37,500	39,500
Deputy Secretary	30,250	32,500	34,250
Under Secretary	25,000	26,750	27,750
Lord Chief Justice	52,500	56,500	60,000
Master of the Rolls Lord of Appeal	48,250	51,750	55,000
Vice Chancellor Lord Justice of Appeal	45,500	49,000	52,000
High Court Judge	42,500	45,500	48,000

We note that our recommendations, which would bring the salary of a superior court judge to approximately that of a DM3, are consistent with the salary scale adopted in the United Kingdom, by which it has been determined that a High Court Judge should be paid the same as the Secretary to the Cabinet.

We accept the 1975 level as satisfactory for that year and recommend that a new base be established in 1985 by applying the Industrial Composite Index to the 1975 figure for the years 1976-83, capped by a 6% and 5% increase for 1983 and 1984, respectively. The statutory increase provided by Section 19.2 of the Judges Act can then apply for 1986, at which time a further review will be undertaken.

We note that the merger of county and district courts with the superior courts of the provinces will shortly result in only three provinces — Ontario, British Columbia and Nova Scotia — retaining courts at this level. We also note that the jurisdiction of such county courts as remain is coming increasingly closer to that of the superior courts.

We recommend that the salaries of judges of the county and district courts should be calculated by reference to the same formula as has been applied with respect to the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, but that an absolute differential between the county and district courts and the superior courts be fixed at $5,000, such differential to be retained until review by the next triennial commission. Accordingly, a Chief Judge would receive the salary of a Chief Justice of a superior court less $5,000, while the other judges would receive $5,000 less than puisne judges.

At present, the judges of the Federal Court of Canada receive a taxable allowance of $2,000 to offset provincial subventions paid to members of the superior courts in four provinces. We believe that our recommendations represent a full salary proposal for federally-appointed judges. We also believe that it is undesirable for such judges to receive any extra compensation from the provinces. Federally-appointed judges should be entirely federally-paid. To deal with both points, we recommend that the present taxable allowance paid to judges of the Federal Court be eliminated. We also recommend that the four provinces which pay similar allowances to federally-appointed judges be asked to discontinue the practice.

We do this, even though we recognize that provincial payments might partly offset the high cost of living in some jurisdictions. We believe these variations from one part of the country to another do create difficulties. This is particularly obvious in the large urban centres, where there is the additional factor that judicial salaries cannot seriously compete with the incomes of lawyers in the major firms. On the whole, however, we have concluded that we should not recommend regional variations in judicial salaries, so as to avoid the creation of different classes within the judiciary. We also see a practical problem in determining the criteria which might justify such variations. We nonetheless recognize the difficulty of setting average salaries appropriate to all areas of the country, and recommend that the next triennial commission address this issue further.

THE TAXATION OF NEW JUDGES

In the course of its discussions with the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and the Canadian Judges Conference, and with the Special Committee of the Canadian Bar Association, the Commission was apprised of the disincentives to accepting judicial appointment brought about by our present system of taxation. If the newly-appointed judge is not aware of the tax implications of winding up his practice on accepting judicial office, he may find himself faced with a crippling tax bill in his first year as judge which may largely deplete the investment of his professional lifetime. If a practitioner approached to accept a judicial appointment is aware of the tax implications, he may determine that he cannot afford to become a judge. Either situation is undesirable. We accordingly adopt the recommendation of the Dorfman Committee that alleviation of the current burden of taxation imposed upon a judge in his first year in office be effected by a specific amendment to the Judges Act.

The income for tax purposes of a newly-appointed judge may include proceeds of the disposition of his practice, his 1971 receivable reserve at the end of the the preceeding year and the income from more than one year if the practice in which he was engaged had a fiscal year other than the calendar year. The first of these may include some capital gain, and all of these impacts of appointment occur in the nature of things rather peremptorily without much scope for tax planning.

In some cases the taxable income does not represent current cash flow and hence presents tax payment problems. We therefore believe a simple approach giving some tax relief to the newly appointed judge is desirable.

We recommend that, if possible by amending the Judges Act, a maximum tax rate for provincial and federal income taxes together of about 25% be imposed on the following types of income:

—1971 account receivable reserve

—unbilled work in progress calculated at the date of appointment

—depreciation recapture on disposition of business assets

—deferred practice income, i.e., practice income earned prior to January 1 of the year of appointment, but not taxed in a preceding year (determined on a proration basis)

Thus a new judge appointed in a year whose partnership year-end was January 31, would be entitled to the special rate on 11/12 of his practice income for the year ended January 31.

We believe the best way to achieve this nearly 25% rate would be to deem one-half of the forms of taxable income of the sort referred to above to be non-taxable, so as to bring into play Section 81(1) of the Income Tax Act. We recommend that Quebec be asked to make a similar provision in relation to its taxation of these forms of income.

We also believe that it would be useful for those considering appointment to have available to them a description of the tax and other implications of accepting an appointment. The nature of the judicial appointment process does not give the candidate much time for consideration of these matters, and hence we recommend that the Minister have prepared and available for candidates such an information bulletin.

JUDICIAL ANNUITIES

At present, Section 23 of the Judges Act authorizes the conferral of an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office of a judge at the time of his resignation, removal or ceasing to hold office, upon any judge who

(a) has continued in office for fifteen years and has attained the age of 65, if he resigns his office;

(b) has continued in office for fifteen years but has not attained the age of 65, if his resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest;

(c) resigns or is removed as a result of becoming afflicted with a permanent disability preventing him from executing his office; or

(d) has reached the age for mandatory retirement, if he has held office for at least ten years.

If a judge reaches mandatory retirement age without fulfilling the last condition, he is entitled to an annuity pro-rated on the basis of the number of years he has held office.

Section 29.1 of the Judges Act, enacted in 1975, initiated the imposition of contributions by the judiciary towards their annuities, which to that point had been wholly non-contributory. Although the measure did not receive Royal Assent until December 20, 1975, it was made retroactive to require all judges appointed from the date the bill was first introduced in Parliament (February 17, 1975) henceforth to contribute at the rate of 6% of salary towards their own annuities and at the rate of a further 1½% towards annuities for spouses and dependents. Judges appointed before February 16, 1975 were required to contribute only at the rate of 1½%.

The Commission views judges' annuities as an important part of their total compensation. We do not consider the issue of contributions to annuities as in any way affecting the independence of the judiciary. As has been the conclusion of previous advisory committees, however, we consider a long-standing differential between judges doing the same work to be inappropriate, and as leading to the creation of two classes of judges. We therefore believe that all judges should contribute at a rate of 1½%, the rate now applicable to judges appointed prior to February 16, 1975.

With the Dorfman and de Grandpré Committees, we feel that those judges who have contributed at the higher rate since 1975 should be reimbursed the excess of their contributions over 1½% with interest at National Revenue tax refund rates compounded annually. We further recommend that the non-tax paid part of such contributions should be transferrable to a Registered Retirement Savings Plan in order to minimize the negative tax effect of the lump sum payment, without otherwise affecting the rights a judge may have with regard to an R.R.S.P. in the year of refund.

We indicated earlier that the value of a judicial annuity was to be taken into consideration in any examination of total compensation for the judiciary. The table in Appendix A shows that in some cases the value of an annuity is very high, a factor which might have led us to suggest salaries at a level lower than we have recommended. However, it is our view that the emphasis in any consideration of judicial salaries and benefits should be on current salary, rather than on prospective benefits. For many judges, particularly those in the large urban centres and in areas with a high cost of living, cash flow is an increasing problem. We therefore feel that salaries should be significantly increased, while less emphasis should be placed upon the value of an annuity. We believe that some of the very high values of annuity should be modified accordingly, and that 15 years is a better minimum period than ten for entitlement to a full annuity. Similarly, we would recommend that the annuity of those who retire with fewer than 15 years of service should be based on the proportion of their years of service to the 15 year minimum.

We have been made aware of at least one recent case in which a judge, after holding office for over ten years but less than fifteen, resigned his office and was thereby disentitled from receiving any benefit apart from the return of his contributions. We feel it is unfair that an individual who has performed dedicated service to the public in the execution of his office should not be entitled to some pension benefit with respect to his years of service.

We accordingly recommend that a judge with no final qualification for retirement should be entitled to a partial annuity after completing ten years of service on the bench, that annuity to be calculated on the basis of his number of years of service expressed as a fraction of the total number of years he would have served had he remained on the bench for a minimum of fifteen years or until age 65, whichever is the later. He would thereupon be entitled to a partial annuity at age 65 based upon the product obtained by applying that fraction to the annuity he would have been entitled to had he been eligible for retirement in the year he left the bench, with indexing commencing in the year in which he first receives payment of annuity benefits. Widow's and dependents' annuities would be calculated on the same basis.

Such a measure would prevent abuse of ss.23(1)(b), and at the same time provide an incentive to a judge to make a commitment to his office for a minimum term of ten years. We were impressed by submissions from the judiciary that a judgeship should be considered a lifetime career. We would not be in favour of vesting for judicial annuities after a period shorter than ten years, despite the current trend towards immediate vesting in both the public and the private sector, in order to discourage the possibility that a judgeship be viewed merely as a stepping-stone in a legal career. We feel that our recommendation for partial annuities is justified in light of the comparative youthfulness of many judges appointed over the past ten years. These appointments have resulted in the establishment of a cadre of young men and women on the bench who will still be far short of the usual age for retirement after completing fifteen years in office. The provision of a partial annuity would compensate them in some measure if, after serving a minimum of ten years as judge, they should determine to relinquish their judicial office. Despite our hope that these judges would remain until normal retirement, we feel that a judge ought not to be penalized unduly by reason of his age, nor should he be kept unwillingly in office.

Finally, we agree that a spouse's annuity should not be suspended in the event she remarries. We accordingly adopt the recommendation of the de Grandpré Report that ss.25(3) of the Judges Act be repealed.

REPRESENTATIONAL ALLOWANCES

An aggregate allowance for representational expenses incurred by the chief justice of a court or by a judge acting on his behalf, by a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, by a chief judge of a county court, and by the senior judges of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory and of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories is presently provided by subsections 20(4) and (5) of the Judges Act. The current aggregate permitted for each category is as follows:

(a)	the Chief Justice of Canada	$5,000
(b)	each puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada	2,500

(c)	the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada, the chief justice of each province, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island	3,500
(d)	each other chief justice of a court	2,500
(e)	the senior judge of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory and the senior judge of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories, each	2,500
(f)	each chief judge of a county or district court	2,500
(g)	the senior county court judge of a province	2,500

This allowance is designed to reimburse a judge for expenses actually incurred by him for travelling, hospitality and related amounts in connection with the extra-judicial obligations and responsibilities that devolve upon him by virtue of his office.

The Commission heard with considerable disquiet of the inadequacy of the present scale of allowances. We consider it unseemly that a chief justice should be required to absorb from his after-tax resources expenses he has incurred on behalf of his court or on behalf of the government of his province or country. In view of the wide regional variation in such expenditures, no further attempt should be made to establish a scale for such allowances. It is our recommendation that in place of the present ceiling on representational allowances, actual expenses certified by the chief justice be reimbursed under this head. We further recommend that the Canadian Judicial Council be asked to develop guidelines for the use of the representational allowance.

CONFERENCE ALLOWANCES

Section 22 of the Judges Act authorizes payment of the expenses incurred by judges for attendance at two kinds of conferences, meetings or seminars. With respect to the first category, those a judge is expressly authorized by law to attend, he is entitled to be reimbursed for his reasonable travelling and other expenses actually incurred in so attending. With respect to the second category, those a judge may attend with the approval of the chief justice or chief judge of the court, he is entitled to be reimbursed as above, subject to the imposition of an aggregate amount by court. In the case of judges of the provincial superior and county courts, the aggregate amount available as a conference allowance in any year is the greater of the product obtained by multiplying the number of judges of that court by the sum of $350, and $3,000.

In terms of the cost of transportation alone, the Commission feels that the present amount is inadequate. While it might logically be assumed that the current maximum would impose greater constraints upon the smaller courts, in fact the larger courts suffer at least equally by reason of having to establish individual priorities for attendance at such conferences among a greater number of judges. A judge in such circumstances may be prevented from attending a meeting from which both he and his court would benefit through lack of resources in the conference budget. We recommend that the product be increased by establishing a multiplier of $500, and a minimum of $5,000 per court.

REMOVAL ALLOWANCES

A removal allowance is payable to a judge under Section 21.1 of the Judges Act for moving and other expenses incurred in assuming his duties as judge or by reason of his being reassigned to a place other than that at which he resided prior to his reassignment. A certain measure of flexibility is afforded to this allowance by providing that the types of expenses contemplated shall be prescribed by regulation. Pursuant to this authority, the Judges Act (Removal Allowance) Order has been enacted. The Order deals in a comprehensive fashion with the expenditures which shall be reimbursable out of this allowance, and has the additional advantage of being readily amended, as required from time to time.

We are informed that the removal allowance is functioning adequately. Accordingly, we have no general recommendations to make, apart from the suggestion that the terms of the Removal Allowance Order continue to be closely monitored, so that it may respond quickly to changing economic conditions.

We do have a specific recommendation to make, however, with respect to its application to the judges appointed to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Unlike all other members of the federally-appointed judiciary, the northern judges may normally expect to be reassigned after a number of years to the bench of another jurisdiction. In such a case, moving expenses incurred in taking up his new appointment would be reimbursable to a judge under the Removal Allowance Order. However, should a judge remain in the north until his retirement, there is presently no provision in the Judges Act which would permit him to be reimbursed for his expenses in returning to the south. Similarly, should a northern judge die in office, his widow and dependents are not entitled to assistance in relocating. We recommend that these anomalies be removed by an appropriate amendment to the Judges Act.

INCIDENTAL AND OTHER ALLOWANCES

The 1981 amendments to the Judges Act introduced, effective April 1, 1979 and for subsequent years, an accountable allowance in the amount of $1,000 "for reasonable incidental expenditures that the fit and proper execution of his office as judge may require". The allowance was originally intended to be applied against the cost of court attire, law books and periodicals, membership in legal and judicial organizations, and other like expenditures. These categories have now been broadened to include other expenses not recoverable under any other provision of the Judges Act and which may relate to the execution of judicial functions.

We approve the greater flexibility which is being addressed to the administration of this allowance. In view of the fact that it is a recent innovation, we recommend no change in the base amount at this time.

We received the benefit of separate representations by Mr. Justice T.D. Marshall of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories on behalf of himself and his northern colleagues as to the adequacy of the $4,000 non-accountable allowance provided by ss.20(2) of the Judges Act. In view of the higher cost of living in the north, and the difficulties northern judges and their families encounter as to transportation and housing, this allowance does not adequately compensate the judges for the increased level of their expenses. The most immediate problem appears to be the availability of adequate housing.

At present, judges in the north are entitled to rental accommodation in federally-owned housing on the same basis as civil servants posted to the north. We were unimpressed by the quality of housing made available to members of the judiciary in the north. We feel that it is important for the dignity of the office which they hold that the judges be given accommodation appropriate to their stature in the community. We strongly recommend that the quality of housing made available to the judiciary be considerably upgraded, and that it be reasonably comparable, by northern standards, to the housing of judges elsewhere in the country. If such accommodation cannot be obtained on a rental basis, we are prepared to recommend that the judges be permitted to obtain their own housing, and that the northern allowance be increased to offset the loss of any subsidy of which they may now have the benefit.

SABBATICAL OR EDUCATIONAL LEAVES

It is the understanding of the Commission that a system of periodic educational leaves is to be instituted on a trial basis, under the general supervision of the Canadian Judicial Council. We have studied the proposal made by the Conference of Chief Justices dated September 14, 1982, and agree with the Joint Commitee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and the Canadian Judges Conference that it would be premature to deal further with this issue at this time.

ELECTION OF CHIEF JUSTICE OR CHIEF JUDGE

Clause 5 of the itemization in the terms of reference of the Commission required that we inquire into the adequacy of Section 20.3 of the Judges Act, whereby the chief justice or associate chief justice of a provincial superior court, or the chief judge of a county or district court, could elect to relinquish his duties as such and thereafter assume only the duties of a puisne or ordinary judge of the court. At the time the Commission was appointed, a minimum term of ten years as chief justice or chief judge was required before this option could be exercised. However, Bill C-166, which became law in June 1983, contains an amendment reducing the term required under Section 20.3 to five years. The Commission accordingly feels that it is unnecessary at this time to make any recommendation on this item.

ALTERNATIVES FOR FIXING JUDICIAL COMPENSATION

We were greatly impressed by the procedure which has been adopted by the State of New South Wales in Australia, whereby an independent Remuneration Tribunal is empowered to address the issue of salaries for the judiciary, amongst others. The Tribunal thereafter makes its report, and unless there is specific objection to its recommendations by fifty per cent of the legislature, after the passage of a fixed time the recommendations become law. This procedure, known as proceeding by way of a negative resolution, would appear to be a desirable innovation in dealing with judicial salaries and benefits.

Section 100 of our Constitution Act states:

> The Salaries, Allowances and Pensions of the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts (except the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick), and of the Admiralty Courts in Cases where the Judges thereof are for the Time being paid by Salary, shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

We are advised that the wording of this section precludes the adoption of the negative resolution procedure in Canada. The section is interpreted as requiring the active participation of Parliament in fixing the level of judicial salaries, allowances and pensions. We do not feel, however, that this should be a final barrier to the adoption of such a procedure. The New South Wales procedure appears to be an efficient way of dealing with judicial salaries. We therefore recommend that the possibility be addressed of developing a similar formula for the adjustment of judicial remuneration, including the need for a constitutional amendment, which formula would in no way derogate from Parliament's overall control.

All of which is respectfully submitted, this sixth day of October, 1983.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That a new base for the salaries of superior court judges be established in 1985 by applying the Industrial Composite Index to 1975 salary levels for the years 1976-83, capped by 6% and 5% increases for 1983 and 1984, respectively.

2. That the salaries of county and district court judges be calculated by reference to the same formula as has been applied with respect to the salaries of judges of the superior courts, but with an absolute differential of $5,000.

3. That those provinces which continue to provide extra compensation to members of the federally-appointed judiciary be asked to discontinue this practice, and that the $2,000 allowance to Federal Court judges be removed.

4. That the next triennial commission address the issue of regional and cost of living variations for judicial salaries and allowances.

5. That one-half of the income additionally taxable in the year of appointment be deemed exempt from taxation for purposes of Section 81(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act and that the Province of Quebec be asked to make a similar provision in regard to its income tax law.

6. That the Minister of Justice have an information booklet prepared and distributed to all lawyers who may be approached to accept judicial appointment.

7. That judges who have contributed to annuities since 1975 be reimbursed the excess of their contributions over 1½% with interest at National Revenue tax refund rates compounded annually, and that the non-tax paid part of such contributions be transferrable to a Registered Retirement Savings Plan without otherwise affecting the rights a judge may have with regard to an R.R.S.P. in the year of refund.

8. That a judge be entitled to a full annuity only after serving a minimum of fifteen years in office.

9. That partial annuities be provided to any judge who leaves the bench after serving at least ten years, such annuities to be calculated by reference to his years of service expressed as a fraction of the total number of years he would have served had he remained on the bench for a minimum of fifteen years or until age 65, whichever is the later.

10. That subsection 25(3) of the Judges Act, which suspends a spouse's annuity in the event she remarries, be repealed.

11. That actual expenses certified by the chief justice be reimbursed from the representational allowance, and that the Canadian Judicial Council be asked to develop guidelines for the use of this allowance.

12. That the conference allowance be increased by establishing a multiplier of $500, and a minimum of $5,000 per court.

13. That the Judges Act be amended to provide for payment of a removal allowance to a northern judge upon retirement, and to the spouse and dependents of a northern judge who has died in office, to assist relocation.

14. That the quality of housing made available to northern judges be considerably upgraded, and that it be reasonably comparable, by northern standards, to the housing of judges elsewhere in the country.

15. That the possibility be addressed of developing a formula for the adjustment of judicial remuneration similar to that in effect in New South Wales, which formula would in no way derogate from Parliament's overall control.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE 1986 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

Submitted to the Minister of Justice of Canada

Cat. No. J2-69/1987

ISBN 0-662-55058-7

Pursuant to Section 19.3 of the Judges Act, I am now tabling the Report and Recommendations of the 1986 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, appointed as of September 1, 1986 to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally. In accordance with Standing Order 67(4) of the House of Commons, this document shall be deemed to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

The Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn Minister of Justice and
Attorney General of Canada

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE 1986 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

1986 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

I. Background

Members: Mr. H. Donald Guthrie, Q.C. (Chairman)
Mr. Edward H. Crawford
Mtre Jeannine M. Rousseau
Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams, Q.C.

Executive Secretary: Mr. Harold Sandell

Terms of Reference

The 1986 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits was appointed as of September 1, 1986, by the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to section 19.3 of the Judges Act, and was given the following terms of reference:

> "The Commission shall, pursuant to section 19.3 of the Judges Act, inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally.
> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the Commission shall inquire into and report upon the following matters:
> 1. The adequacy of salaries and allowances paid under the Act, having due regard for the adjustments made by S.C. 1985, c. 48.
> 2. The granting of annuities provided to judges and pursuant to subsection 23(1) of the Act, and more particularly >   (a) the criteria for retirement with full benefits under the Act;
>   (b) the pro-rating of annuities for judges who resign without qualifying for full benefits under the Act;
>   (c) the contributions payable by judges towards annuities payable on the terms fixed by the Act.
> 3. The granting of annuities provided to surviving spouses and children pursuant to sections 25, 26 and 27 of the Act.
> The Commission shall report to the Minister of Justice upon the results of the inquiry in accordance with subsection 19.3(2) of the Act."

Further to these terms of reference, the Minister wrote to the Chairman on December 8, 1986 requesting that the Commission examine, as part of its statutory terms of reference, the matter of a removal allowance for judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Canada and the Tax Court of Canada who wish to leave Ottawa and live in another part of Canada on retirement.

The Commission held meetings and/or hearings as follows:

September 17, 1986 – Toronto
November 26, 27 and 28, 1986 – Ottawa
December 16, 1986 – Toronto
January 17 and 18, 1987 – Toronto
January 24 and 25, 1987 – Toronto
February 6, 7 and 8, 1987 – Toronto
February 17, 1987 – Telephone conference
February 18, 1987 – Telephone conference
February 24, 1987 – Telephone conference

Notice to the Public, Submissions and Hearings

The Commission published a Notice in 21 newspapers across Canada, during September and October, 1986, inviting written submissions and presentations at oral hearings, in either official language, concerning matters within the Commission's terms of reference. Notice was also given to a number of interested organizations and individuals. The Commission offered to conduct oral hearings in Halifax, Vancouver, Edmonton, Montreal and Ottawa during October and November, 1986.

Copies of the Notice in English and French are reproduced as Appendix "A". The Notice was published in the following newspapers:

St. John's Evening Telegram
Charlottetown Guardian
Halifax Chronicle-Herald
Le Courrier
Saint John Telegraph Journal
Le Soleil
La Presse
Montreal Gazette
Le Droit
Ottawa Citizen
The Globe and Mail
The Lawyers Weekly
Winnipeg Free Press
Regina Leader Post
Calgary Herald
Edmonton Journal
Le Franco-Albertain
Vancouver Province
Le Soleil de Colombie
The Yellowknifer
Whitehorse Star

Written submissions were received from the groups and individuals listed in Appendix "B".

The only requests for oral hearings were for Ottawa. These hearings took place on November 27 and 28, 1986, at the Canada Council Hearing Room, 99 Metcalfe Street. The following organizations, with the counsel indicated, made oral presentations to the Commission:

1. The Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and Chief Judges and the Canadian Judges Conference

Counsel Appearing: John J. Robinette, Q.C., Toronto
Yves Fortier, Q.C., Montreal

2. Justices of the Supreme Court of Ontario

Counsel Appearing: John F. Howard, Q.C., Toronto

3. The Canadian Bar Association Standing Committee on Pensions for Judges' Spouses and Judges' Salaries

Counsel Appearing: Bryan Williams, Q.C., Vancouver
(President of the Association)
S.J. Safian, Q.C., Regina
(Chairman of the Standing Committee)
H.A.D. Oliver, Q.C., Vancouver
Thomas J. Walsh, Q.C., Calgary
Robert B. Goodwin, Winnipeg
John Fortier, Charlottetown
George A. Allison, Q.C., Montreal

Previous Committees and Commissions

The 1986 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits is the fifth federal committee or commission established in recent years to inquire into and make recommendations to the Minister of Justice with respect to judicial salaries, allowances and benefits. It is the second commission appointed pursuant to section 19.3 of the Judges Act.

In September, 1974, a Special Advisory Committee, under the chairmanship of the Honourable Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, a retired member of the Supreme Court of Canada, reported to the Minister. The Dorfman Committee on Judicial Compensation and Related Matters, under the chairmanship of Irwin Dorfman, Q.C., (hereinafter, the "Dorfman Committee") reported to the Minister in November, 1978. The de Grandpré Committee on Judicial Annuities, under the chairmanship of Jean de Grandpré, Q.C. (hereinafter, the "de Grandpré Committee"), reported in December, 1981. The 1983 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the first of the "Triennial Commissions" established pursuant to section 19.3 of the Judges Act, was chaired by the Honourable Otto Lang, P.C., Q.C. (hereinafter, the "Lang Commission") and it reported to the Minister in October, 1983.

Acknowledgements

The Commission wishes to thank Pierre Garceau, Q.C., Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, and the members of his staff, in particular André Gareau and Louise Fox, for their support throughout the Commission's mandate.

We also thank Walter Riese, F.C.I.A., F.S.A., Chief Actuary of the Department of Insurance of Canada, and Claude Gagné, F.C.I.A., F.S.A., an Actuary on his staff, for their valuable assistance.

The Commission retained the services of Clarkson Gordon in connection with taxation matters discussed in this report and expresses its thanks to William E. Crawford, C.A. and Jennifer L. Shaw, C.A., for their excellent assistance.

The Commission was fortunate indeed to have had assigned to it as Executive Secretary, Harold Sandell of the Department of Justice in Ottawa. We wish to express our sincere appreciation for his enthusiastic, diligent and dedicated service, without which our task could not have been accomplished as effectively and expeditiously. His extensive knowledge of the Canadian legal and judicial systems and relevant statute law has been of immeasurable assistance.

II. Introduction

The principle that the judiciary exercises its authority independently of the executive and the legislature is fundamental to our democratic system.[1] The Constitution Act, 1867 recognizes this principle by conferring on the Governor General, and not on the Governor in Council, the authority to appoint the judges of the provincial superior, district and county courts, as well as the authority to remove superior court judges, and then only following a joint address of the Senate and House of Commons. The Constitution Act, 1867 further recognizes this fundamental principle by imposing on Parliament, and not on the executive, the duty to fix and provide the salaries, allowances and pensions of superior, district and county court judges. The concept of judicial independence is also implicit in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the Canadian Bill of Rights. Furthermore, the law of Canada, in the form of doctrine and jurisprudence, has long recognized the concept of the independence of the judiciary, as have our inherited legal traditions. In addition, Canada is obligated to maintain an independent judiciary pursuant to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[2], and the principle is further recognized in other international instruments.

One of the essential elements of judicial independence depends upon Parliament's duty to fix and provide judicial salaries, allowances and pensions. This remuneration should provide the element of financial security. The process and institutions whereby judicial compensation is fixed and provided must preclude the arbitrary interference of the executive in the determination and granting of judges' salaries and benefits. The actual monetary amounts involved must be sufficient to permit a judge and his or her family to be and to be perceived by society to be financially secure bearing in mind the statutory requirement that a judge not engage in any occupation or business, but rather devote himself or herself exclusively to judicial duties. Furthermore, the level of salaries and benefits should make appointment to the bench sufficiently attractive to the best qualified lawyers.

It is within this overall context that the Commission has inquired into the adequacy of judges' salaries and benefits.

III. The Review Process

Section 19.3 of the Judges Act provides for the appointment by the Minister of Justice, every third year, of not less than three and not more than five Commissioners "to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under [the Judges Act] and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally". The section further provides that within six months of their appointment, the Commissioners must submit a report to the Minister of Justice "containing such recommendations as they consider appropriate". The Minister of Justice causes the report to be laid before Parliament "not later than the tenth sitting day of Parliament after he receives it".

Parliament has therefore legislated a time limit of six months from appointment for the Commissioners to report, as well as a time limit of ten days from receipt for the Minister to table the report in Parliament.

It is our understanding that the underlying purposes of the legislation providing for the review, by Triennial Commissions, of the adequacy of judges' salaries and other amounts payable under the Judges Act and of the adequacy of judges' benefits generally, are to reduce the element of partisan politics in the adjustment of judicial compensation and to reinforce the principle of judicial independence by obtaining the recommendations of "persons with experience and expertise after a full and independent review".

Delay in implementing or substantial disregard of the recommendations of a Triennial Commission threatens the integrity of the review process and materially reduces its effectiveness. Regrettable delays in coming to decisions concerning the reports of the Dorfman and de Grandpré Committees and the Lang Commission should be avoided in the future.

We therefore recommend that Parliament either agree promptly with and implement quickly the individual recommendations of this and subsequent Triennial Commissions or, if necessary, indicate promptly its disagreement with any of such recommendations.

IV. Judicial Salaries

In addition to a process of careful selection, a vital means of ensuring the competence and independence of the judiciary is the provision in our constitution requiring Parliament to fix and provide the salaries, allowances and pensions of judges. It is equally clear that the need for judicial independence, for attracting to the bench the best qualified lawyers, and for maintaining the morale and financial security of the judiciary means that judges are a distinct group with compensation requirements that set them apart from the public service, with which they are often erroneously compared.

Canada has been fortunate in the quality of its judges, a standard which it is most important to maintain.

Three quotations are as à propos today as when they were originally stated. The first, regarding the need for security and independence, is from a speech made by the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Sankey, to the House of Lords in 1933:

> "It is we think beyond question that the Judges are not in the position occupied by civil servants. They are appointed to hold particular offices of dignity and exceptional importance. They occupy a vital place in the constitution of this country. They stand equally between the Crown and the Executive, and between the Executive and the subject. They have to discharge the gravest and most responsible duties. It has for two centuries been considered essential that their security and independence should be maintained inviolate."[1]

The second, taken from the same speech by Viscount Sankey, pertains to the competence of the judiciary:

> "... we cannot avoid expressing a fear that if the salary and prestige of a High Court Judge are to remain as at present, those who will succeed us will probably not, as in the past, be drawn from the leaders of the Bar. There is now so little attraction to them to accept a seat upon the Bench, that it will be impossible to induce leading members of the Bar to make the necessary sacrifice.
> "The consequences ... will be far-reaching and detrimental to the true interests of the country."[2]

The third, also concerning competence on the bench, is from an often-quoted portion of a speech reprinted in the Canadian Bar Review of 1927, by the Honourable R.B. Bennett, K.C. (as he then was), later to be Prime Minister:

> "Now if men enjoying large incomes have no ambition to go upon the Bench it follows that you have to fall back upon the second line, and instead of appointing the best men to the judiciary you have recourse to men of indifferent qualifications in their profession ...".[3]

Recent constitutional changes have reinforced this need for our courts to remain attractive to men and women of the highest calibre. The role of the judiciary as a result of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is of revolutionary significance in the legal history of Canada, and it has thrust our judiciary into the forefront of law-making, alongside Parliament itself.

We consequently reiterate and affirm the comment in the report of the Lang Commission (page 2) that:

> "The place of the judiciary has increased in importance in the light of recent constitutional developments in Canada, particularly the enactment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The judiciary also plays a greater role in shaping our lives because of the growing complexity of our social and economic relationships. The independence of the judiciary is part and parcel of their unique position."

The Supreme Court of Canada, in the recent Beauregard decision, affirmed that since as far back as the Act of Settlement in 1700, independence of the judiciary has been predicated on both security of tenure and financial security.[4]

These considerations underlie the Commission's examination and conclusions with respect to judicial salaries.

As a result of 1975 amendments to the Judges Act, the salary level of superior court puisne judges was made roughly equivalent to the mid-point of the salary range of the most senior level (DM3) of federal deputy minister. This was not intended to suggest equivalence of factors to be considered in the salary determination process, for no other group shares with the judiciary the necessities of maintaining independence and of attracting recruits from among the best qualified individuals in a generally well-paid profession. In 1975, judicial salary equivalence to senior deputy ministers was generally regarded, however, as satisfying all of the criteria to be considered in determining judicial salaries. At that salary level, a sufficient degree of financial security was assured and there were few financial impediments to recruiting well-qualified lawyers for appointment to the bench.

Like the Lang Commission, we believe the 1975 judicial salary scale was satisfactory for that year and we recommend that a new salary base be established as of April 1, 1986, by applying the Industrial Composite Index to the 1975 salary level for the years 1976 to 1986, capped by a 6% and 5% increase for 1983 and 1984, respectively (while the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act was in force). The annual salary adjustment provided for by section 19.2 of the Judges Act[5] would then apply for 1987 and 1988, to a maximum of 7% in each of those years, following which the 1989 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits would again review salary levels.

Indexing is the only means yet devised to permit Parliament to discharge its constitutional duty under section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 without the presentation of salary amendment bills on each occasion. In addition, it provides a relatively non-contentious means of adjusting judicial salaries between parliamentary action on Triennial Commission recommendations.

The income of judges has failed to keep pace with other groups in our society. The importance of calculating a base salary which is fair to judges cannot be over-emphasized, since successive annual shortfalls in income are built in and compounded if either the original or a subsequent base salary is lower than it should be. The Lang Commission made a calculation error in applying the Industrial Composite Index for the years 1976 to 1983 to the 1975 base salary of $53,000. The April 1, 1985, base salary figure for superior court puisne judges should have been $123,400, rather than $119,000 (see Appendix "C", submitted in evidence by the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits, which states the accurate calculation for 1985 to be $123,500. This Commission arrives instead at a 1985 corrected figure of $123,400). On the basis of our recommendation to apply the Industrial Composite Index to the 1975 salary (of $53,000) for each of the years 1976 to 1986 (capped at 6% and 5% for 1983 and 1984), the salary calculations in Column 4 of the following table result.

1 Year	2 Actual	3 % change in industrial composite	4 Salary calculation[6] in accordance with industrial composite index
1975	$ 53,000[7]	—	—
1976	53,000	14.17	$ 60,500
1977	55,000	12.14	67,800
1978	57,000	9.61	74,300
1979	57,000	6.16	78,800
1980	70,000	8.65	85,600
1981	74,900	10.08	94,200
1982	80,100	11.93	105,400
1983	84,900	9.99 (6% cap)	111,700
1984	89,100	7.37 (5% cap)	117,200
1985	105,000	5.31	123,400
1986	108,700	3.53	127,700

The recommended levels of salary as of April 1, 1986 are therefore as follows:

Judges, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts – $127,700
Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts – $139,700
Judges, Supreme Court of Canada – $151,700
Chief Justice of Canada – $163,800

These recommended salaries for the Federal Court of Canada and superior court Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices, and for the Judges and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, would restore the relationships which existed in 1975 vis-à-vis the salary of Federal Court of Canada and superior court puisne judges (then $53,000, now recommended to be $127,700 as of April 1, 1986).

The Commission has independent knowledge of eminently qualified lawyers who have declined appointment to the bench due to the loss of income that would result. If implemented, these recommended salaries would satisfy to a much greater extent the dual requirements of ensuring financial security for the judiciary and attracting well-qualified lawyers to the bench. The Burns Report on Executive Compensation in the Public Service (May, 1985)[8], which dealt with rates of pay and conditions of service for managers in the federal public service, recommended salary ranges at the senior deputy minister level of between $106,500 (minimum) and $132,500 (maximum), effective April 1, 1985.

The Peat Marwick Compensation Study undertaken for the federal Department of Justice in 1985 (portions of which are reproduced below) surveyed associates and partners of law firms (75% of the sample) and lawyers of corporations and municipal and provincial governments (25% of the sample). The Peat Marwick Study indicates that the average income (including salary, bonuses and the value of stock (for in-house corporate counsel) or share of profits (for law firm partners)) for lawyers called to the bar between 1960 and 1964 (the years of call of lawyers likely to be approached currently for appointment to the bench) was $124,548 in 1985:

Total Average Income by Year of Call to Bar for Associates/Partners for all Sectors

Year Admitted to the Bar	Average Income	(sample size)
1970-1974	$100,789	(457)
1965-1969	106,206	(194)
1960-1964	124,548	(140)
1955-1959	124,493	(125)
1954 and earlier	102,457	(117)

The Peat Marwick Study also shows that the average income for partners (called to the bar between 1960 and 1964) surveyed in large law firms (defined as 20 or more lawyers) was $155,056 in 1985, which is significantly more than we are recommending be paid to judges as of April 1, 1986:

Average Share of Profits per Partner by Year of Call to Bar for Large Law Firms (20 or more lawyers)

Year Admitted to the Bar	Share of Profits	(sample size)
1970-1974	$121,725	(63)
1965-1969	136,537	(34)
1960-1964	155,056	(30)
1955-1959	151,060	(22)
1954 and earlier	120,161	(30)

The Commission has considered the current salaries of judges in the United Kingdom, as well as the recently proposed (January, 1987) salary increases of federal judges in the United States. We feel that comparisons with British or American judicial salaries are not particularly helpful because of differences in economic and social conditions and fluctuating exchange rates.

The Lang Commission recommended that this Commission address the issue of regional and cost of living variations for judicial salaries. Having considered the matter, we are not disposed to recommend any changes.[9]

5. We note that the salary adjustment formula based on the Industrial Composite will have to be modified in view of the discontinuance of the publication of that index by Statistics Canada. We should mention that the Industrial Aggregate Index has already been adopted, by statutory amendment, in lieu of the Industrial Composite Index for purposes of adjusting benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, and salaries under the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Salaries Act.
6. Lowered to the closest multiple of one hundred dollars (see Judges Act, subsection 19.2(3)).
7. Includes the $3,000 additional salary provided under what was then subsection 20(1) of the Judges Act (since repealed).
8. The Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service (Mr. James W. Burns, Chairman) presented its Eleventh Report to the Prime Minister on May 13, 1985.
9. Pursuant to subsection 20(2) of the Judges Act, the judges on the territorial Supreme Courts receive a non-accountable annual allowance of $4000 as compensation for the higher cost of living in the two territories.

V. Salary Differential between the County and District Courts and the Superior Courts

The Lang Commission recommended that the salaries of judges of the county and district courts "should be calculated by reference to the same formula as has been applied with respect to the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, but that an absolute differential between the county and district courts and the superior courts be fixed at $5,000, such differential to be retained until review by the next triennial commission". Bill C-78 (which received Royal Assent on December 12, 1985 as Chapter 48 of the Statutes of Canada, 1985) gave effect to that recommendation and established as at April 1, 1985, an absolute differential of $5,000 between the salaries of county and district courts and those of superior courts.

Only three provinces, Ontario, British Columbia and Nova Scotia, retain county or district courts. Although the jurisdictional differences between the two levels of courts continue to narrow, the responsibilities of the superior court judges in terms of the subject matter of their jurisdiction and the requirement for travel in the performance of their duties are nevertheless significantly heavier than in the county and district courts. It may be noted that the status of the District Court in Ontario is currently under review as part of Mr. Justice Thomas Zuber's study into the courts of that province, undertaken at the instance of the Attorney General of Ontario. There was no compelling evidence before us and we see no compelling reason to narrow the differential at this time. We therefore recommend that the present differential of $5,000 be maintained.

VI. Incidental Allowance

In 1981, subsection 20(1) of the Judges Act was amended to provide, with effect from April 1, 1979, an accountable annual allowance for judges in the amount of $1,000, separate from salary, "for reasonable incidental expenditures that the fit and proper execution of his office as judge may require". The allowance applies against the cost of repair and replacement of court attire, the purchase of law books and periodicals, membership in legal and judicial organizations and other similar expenses not recoverable under any other provision of the Judges Act.

The inadequacy of the present allowance and the effects of inflation have resulted in the $1,000 maximum being exhausted or even exceeded by many judges. For example, the cost of judicial robes alone (in those provinces where robes are not provided by the provincial authorities) in the first year in office, or periodically thereafter, would exhaust the allowance. Similarly, the purchase of legal texts required by a judge, particularly when the judge is sitting in an outlying judicial centre where the court house library may be less than adequate, could quickly consume a significant portion of the current allowance.

We recommend that the present incidental allowance be increased to $2,500 annually.

VII. Removal Allowances

In 1985, Bill C-78 extended to retiring judges of the Supreme Courts of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and to the surviving spouse and children of judges of those courts who die in office, the benefit of the removal allowance in order to facilitate their relocation to one of the provinces (Judges Act, paragraphs 21.1(1)(c) and (d)). The concurrent addition of subsection 21.1(1.1) of the Judges Act placed a limitation upon eligibility for the use of the removal allowance by a judge of a northern Supreme Court. In order to qualify for the allowance, the judge must have been resident in one of the provinces before his or her appointment to the northern Court.

The 1985 amendments were designed to alleviate possible hardship for any judge, or the family of any judge, in the circumstances provided for therein. Substantially the same potential hardship could occur with respect to a judge (or the family of a judge) who is required to move to Ottawa upon appointment, and who does not want to remain in Ottawa after retirement (or after the judge's death). The judge and his or her family are currently entitled to a removal allowance upon appointment pursuant to section 21.1. However, they are not entitled to an allowance should they wish to leave Ottawa and live in another part of Canada upon retirement or death.

Federal legislation compels the judges of three section 101 [1] courts (the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Canada and the Tax Court of Canada) to reside in or near the National Capital Region (with the exception of judges on the Tax Court of Canada who were formerly members of the Tax Review Board resident outside of the National Capital Region). In order to alleviate the potential hardship referred to above, we recommend that the removal allowance be extended to retiring judges of the three section 101 courts who are required upon appointment to change their place of residence to the vicinity of the National Capital Region, and as well to the surviving spouses and eligible children of these judges who die in office. We also recommend that the removal allowance permit such retiring judges, and/or the family, to move to a place of residence in any one of the ten provinces or two territories. We further recommend that there be a requirement whereby all removal allowances must be utilized within a reasonable period following the relevant event.

VIII. Judicial Annuities

Section 23 of the Judges Act provides for the granting of an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office of a judge at the time of his or her resignation, removal or ceasing to hold office, to a judge who

(a) has continued in office for fifteen years and has attained the age of 65, if he or she resigns his or her office;

(b) has continued in office for fifteen years but has not attained the age of 65, if his or her resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest;

(c) resigns or is removed as a result of becoming afflicted with a permanent disability preventing him or her from executing his or her office; or

(d) has reached the age of mandatory retirement, if he or she has held office for at least ten years.

If a judge reaches mandatory retirement age without having served for ten years, he or she is entitled to an annuity pro-rated on the basis of years of completed service (to the nearest one-tenth of a year) as a proportion of ten years.

In addition, rather than leave the bench after attaining the minimum qualification for retirement, the option exists pursuant to sections 20.01, 20.1 and 20.2 of the Judges Act, for a judge to elect supernumerary status. Under this arrangement, a puisne judge who qualifies for non-mandatory retirement and who is entitled to an annuity may opt instead to continue in office (with a reduced caseload in most instances) while remaining entitled to full salary until the judge is mandatorily retired or otherwise leaves the bench, at which time he or she would receive the annuity. A Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice who elects supernumerary status is entitled to receive only the salary of a puisne judge during his or her supernumerary service, although the subsequent annuity is based on the salary then in effect of a Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice. The supernumerary programme promotes continuity on the bench, while making available positions which could not otherwise be filled until the mandatory retirement of the incumbents. All federally appointed judges except the members of the Supreme Court of Canada are entitled to opt for supernumerary status. Approximately 10% of the federally appointed bench are currently supernumerary judges.

A. Judges' Contributions towards Annuities

The Beauregard decision of the Supreme Court of Canada has settled the constitutional authority of Parliament to require reasonable contributions by judges towards their annuities. This authority is not unlimited, as the following passage from the reasons of the Chief Justice of Canada in the Beauregard judgment makes clear:

> "The power of Parliament to fix the salaries and pensions of superior court judges is not unlimited. If there were any hint that a federal law dealing with these matters was enacted for an improper or colourable purpose, or if there was discriminatory treatment of judges vis-à-vis other citizens, then serious issues relating to judicial independence would arise and the law might well be held to be ultra vires s.100 of the Constitution Act, 1867."[1]

Pursuant to section 29.1 of the Judges Act, enacted in 1975, judges appointed before February 17, 1975 contribute towards their statutory annuities (which include annuities for surviving spouses and children) at a rate of 1½% of salary.[2] Judges appointed after February 16, 1975 contribute towards their statutory annuities at a rate of 6% of salary, and they contribute a further 1% of salary towards the cost of the indexation of their statutory annuities. The Beauregard decision also upheld the legality of this distinction in contribution rates which is based on date of appointment.

The Dorfman Committee recommended that judges should not be required to contribute towards their statutory annuities, and that all judges should be required to contribute towards the cost of supplementary retirement benefits (indexation) at a rate of 1% of salary. The de Grandpré Committee recommended that judicial annuities, including survivors' benefits, and supplementary retirement benefits should all be provided without any judicial contributions. The Lang Commission recommended that all judges should contribute at a rate of 1½% of their salaries towards their statutory annuities, and, one may assume, that they not contribute at all towards the cost of supplementary retirement benefits. Furthermore, the de Grandpré and Lang reports recommended the retroactive reimbursement (with interest) to judges of all (de Grandpré) or a portion (Lang) of the pension contributions theretofore paid. In their written and oral submissions to this Commission, both the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits and the Canadian Bar Association recommended the repeal of the requirement for contributions to the cost of annuities and the retroactive reimbursement of contributions made since 1975.

We do not agree with the recommendations of the earlier Committees and Commission and the submissions made to us with respect to judges' contributions. Judicial pensions are not like ordinary pensions insofar as they are designed to enhance the independence and competence of the bench and to compensate in part for the high or potential earning power which lawyers forego upon acceptance of judicial appointment. The judicial annuity itself constitutes an important element in guaranteeing independence. However, the question of some judicial contribution to the costs of the pension is an entirely different matter, and we do not consider the issue of reasonable contributions to annuities as in any way affecting the independence of the judiciary. In the case of The Judges v. Attorney-General for Saskatchewan, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that a general income tax which charges the official incomes of judges on the same footing as the incomes of other citizens did not interfere with the "independence nor any other attribute of the judiciary".[3] We believe that the same principle applies with respect to contributions to judicial annuities.

The Commission is of the view that the unique character of the judiciary, and in particular the requirement for independence, is currently reflected in a number of aspects relating to judicial pensions. These include the relatively short qualifying period (as little as 10 years in some circumstances in order to qualify for full pension), the supernumerary option, the full indexation of benefits, the fact that the annuity is calculated on the basis of the salary at the time of retirement (and not on the basis of the average salary over a number of years of service immediately prior to retirement), and the disability provision in paragraph 23(1)(c) of the Judges Act. We feel that as this Commission is recommending judicial salaries which are more closely related to those earned by others of similar importance and stature, we must, in order to be consistent, also consider the non-salary benefits, which are unquestionably justified, in the same manner. We would emphasize that the Commission regards its recommendations with respect to salaries and pensions to be integrated components of a comprehensive compensation package. These components are seen by us to be interlinked, and the adoption of only part or parts would distort the philosophy and intent of the recommendations as a whole.

There appears to be little actuarial basis for the contribution rates presently in effect (see Appendix "D").[4] Their significance is essentially historical. The following table, prepared for the Commission in December, 1986 by the Chief Actuary of the Department of Insurance of Canada, shows, for annuities under the Judges Act, sample normal actuarial costs (consisting of the total of a judge's own contributions and the government contributions required to pay for that judge's pension) expressed as a percentage of that judge's entire salary earned during his or her total years on the bench. The table is based on the actuarial assumptions set out below it.

* Illustrative of costs of retirement option not now available under the Judges Act but recommended in Item B below.

Actuarial Assumptions:

Rate of interest: 6.5%
Rate of increase in salaries: 5%
Rate of increase in Consumer Price Index (Indexing): 3.5%
Retirement Age: Age at which pension commences, provided a judge has survived in office to this age without becoming disabled
Mortality: 1983 GAM Table (rated up 3 years for disabled)
Disability: Probability assumed equal to rate of mortality
Proportion married: varying by age (e.g. 0.96 at 50 and 60, 0.73 at 70, 0.51 at 80 and 0.25 at 90)
Relative ages of spouses: Wife three years younger Remarriage: Ignored
Children: Ignored
Withdrawal: 0.5% up to age 55 and 0.0% thereafter
Minimum (Return of Contributions) benefit: Ignored

Benefits Valued:

(a) annuity on disability or retirement equal to two-thirds final salary;

(b) annuity to surviving spouse equal to one half the annuity that was payable to a deceased judge or would have been payable if he or she had become entitled to a full annuity at the date of death;

(c) return of 7% contributions with interest at 4% on death without survivor prior to retirement age, or on resignation from office without entitlement to a pension.

The above table indicates, for example, that a male judge who retires at age 75 after 20 years of service will thereafter receive a full pension equal to two-thirds of his final salary, the full cost of which would have required a contribution of 35.5% of the salary he received in each of his 20 years on the bench. Of that 35.5% contribution required each year, the judge would have contributed 7% (assuming he was appointed after February 16, 1975) and the Crown would have contributed 28.5% in absolute terms.[5] In other words, even the higher judicial contribution rate of 7% of salary, while significant, is a modest contribution indeed in terms of the overall cost of the pension scheme, and seems eminently fair for newly-appointed judges.

We regret the impact which the imposition of judicial contributions has had on judges, yet any partial remedy is likely to create as many inequities as it cures. The unfortunate passage of time has probably rendered a simple solution impractical in any case. In November, 1986, there were 795 judges holding office, of whom 253 (32%) were appointed before February 17, 1975, and are therefore contributing 1½% of salary towards the costs of statutory annuities, and 542 (68%) were appointed after February 16, 1975, and are therefore contributing 6% of salary towards annuities and a further 1% towards supplementary benefits. When these statistics are related to the comparable figures at the time of the de Grandpré Report, when 360 judges (54%) contributed 1½% and 310 judges (46%) contributed 7%, it is evident that the inequities resulting from the "two classes of judges" is being remedied by the passage of time. It should also be mentioned that the present figure for judges contributing 1½% includes virtually all of the approximately 80 supernumerary judges. It is our view that the 1975 decision of Parliament to impose judicial contributions, whereby it created "two classes of judges", and the manner in which it was done, are now history. Parliament has not seen fit to act again notwithstanding the recommendations for change made in the Dorfman, de Grandpré and Lang reports and all things considered, maintenance of the status quo, as time removes the present anomaly, may well be the most realistic approach.

For the above reasons, we do not adopt the recommendations of the past with respect to lowering to 1½%, or to any other rate, or abolishing altogether, judicial contributions towards the cost of statutory annuities and supplementary benefits, or reimbursing contributions.

We therefore recommend that the present rates of judicial contributions towards the costs of both statutory annuities and supplementary benefits (indexing) be maintained (including the February 16-17, 1975 contribution rate differential) and that contributions of the judiciary not be reimbursed.

We note that significant future relief from the double taxation aspect of judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities has now been provided by amendment to the Income Tax Act (see Item G below).

B. "Rule of Eighty"

In the past, appointments of superior, district and county court judges were customarily made from the ranks of more senior members of the bar, i.e., in the age range of 50 years and upwards. However, commencing about 20 years ago, there began a practice of appointing on occasion younger men and women to judicial office, e.g., persons in their late 30's and early 40's. This has been well received and has produced a group of younger people who are able to give periods of long service to the judiciary and meet the increasing demands of the busy court systems. By all appearances, this practice has been successful but because of the longer period of service, some problems have appeared respecting supernumerary status and annuities. The present law was apparently premised on the expectation of more senior appointments and does not readily take into account those who accept an appointment to the bench in the early forties or younger. The Commission believes that long periods of service, regardless of age, merit certain entitlements. The Commission also holds the view that age 60 should be the minimum age at which a judge qualifies for a full pension of two-thirds of salary.

We accept that professional "burnout" may manifest itself within the judiciary, and that retirement from the bench, but not election of supernumerary status, should be available as a solution for judicial "burnout".

We therefore recommend that retirement at full pension, but not the election of supernumerary status, be permitted at the following combinations of age and years of service on the bench: 60 years of age and 20 years of service; 61 and 19; 62 and 18; 63 and 17; and 64 and 16.

Age 75 is fixed by subsection 99(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 (as amended in 1960) for the retirement of judges of provincial superior courts, and a recent court decision[6] has held that the current requirement that judges of the Federal Court retire at age 70 was unconstitutional. We therefore recommend that for the sake of equality and uniformity, the mandatory retirement age be standardized at 75 for all federally appointed judges, and that the mandatory retirement age of judges on the Federal Court of Canada, the Tax Court of Canada and the county and district courts be raised to 75. We also recommend that the supernumerary provisions be standardized for all federally appointed judges except the members of the Supreme Court of Canada.

C. Adequacy of Pension Benefits

Paragraph 25(1)(a) of the Judges Act provides an annuity to the surviving spouse of a judge who dies, equal to one-third of the judge's salary, and paragraph 25(1)(b) of the Act provides an annuity to the surviving spouse of a retired judge who was in receipt of an annuity at the time of death, equal to 50% of the amount of the retired judge's annuity. Both these types of survivor's pensions are indexed pursuant to the provisions of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (R.S.C. 1970, c. 43 (1st Supp.)).

In order to better reflect current values of survivors' benefits provided by many private pension plans and by recent federal and provincial pension benefits and standards legislative reforms, we recommend that the surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office be entitled to an annuity equal to 40% (instead of one-third) of the judge's salary at the time of death. We further recommend that the surviving spouse of a retired judge who dies while in receipt of a pension be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% (instead of 50%) of the amount of the retired judge's pension at the time of death. The benefits of eligible children should be adjusted accordingly. These increases in survivors' benefits should apply only with respect to survivors not in receipt of benefits upon the coming into force of the necessary amendments to the Judges Act.

There are provisions in the Judges Act (paragraphs 29.2(1),(2) and (3)) and in the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (section 6) for the return of pension contributions to a judge. Pursuant to paragraph 29.2(4)(b) of the Judges Act, interest is payable upon the return of contributions made under that Act, at 4% compounded annually. We believe this rate has been unfair and can be unrealistic. We recommend that compound interest be payable upon the return of all contributions at a rate to be varied as and when necessary to reflect the "prescribed rates".[7] If no prescribed rate was in effect, then a rate comparable to the average equivalent yield obtainable during each year on 90-day Government of Canada Treasury Bills should be used.

When a judge dies while in office, a lump sum "gratuity" equal to one-sixth of the judge's annual salary at the time of death is payable immediately to the surviving spouse pursuant to Treasury Board Minute 757563 dated May 18, 1978. We recommend that this gratuity be made a statutory entitlement by provision in the Judges Act.

The Commission was invited to examine the proportion of salary (presently two-thirds) which forms the basis for the annuity. In view of the many favourable aspects of existing judicial annuities referred to previously, and of the recommendations we are making for several other improvements, we do not recommend an increase in the basic pension.

D. Early Retirement and Pro-rated Annuities

Judicial annuities are part of an overall compensation plan designed to reinforce the principle of judicial independence and to help make appointment to the bench attractive to the best qualified among lawyers. Notwithstanding that appointments at younger ages are now being made, appointment still generally comes later in life, often in the fifties (see Appendix "E"), and therefore a relatively short qualification period for full pension entitlement is necessary. All judges are precluded from receiving other salary or remuneration, or engaging in any occupation or business, while holding judicial office (section 36 and subsection 38(1) of the Judges Act). Moreover, it is considered inappropriate for a retired judge to return to active practice in the courts. Society, and particularly the bench and bar, have traditionally taken the view that appointment to the bench should continue to be regarded as the culmination of a lawyer's career, and not as a stepping stone to career advancement. For this reason, judicial pensions should provide sufficient income to obviate the need of a retired judge to return to full practice, but at the same time they should not have the effect of encouraging the early retirement of a serving judge. Furthermore, with respect to a lawyer who was appointed to the bench at a comparatively young age, he or she would probably not have had the opportunity, prior to appointment, to build up a retirement fund. Consequently, the eventual judicial pension must be sufficiently generous as it may be the only source of income upon retirement from the bench.

These considerations appear to be the foundation of the pension provisions presently contained in the Judges Act, and underlie the recommendations contained in this report.

It would not be inconsistent with these principles, and it would add an element of fairness to the situation, if the Judges Act were to entitle a judge to some benefit, other than the simple return with interest of accumulated pension contributions, should he or she choose to depart from the bench without otherwise qualifying for an annuity. Neither the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits nor the Standing Committee of the Canadian Bar Association made submissions on this point, but it is specifically referred to in paragraph 2(b) of the Commission's Terms of Reference and was the subject of submissions by individuals.

We consequently recommend that a judge who has held office for at least ten years and who retires without being entitled to an annuity should have the option of receiving an annuity, payable at age 65 should he or she retire before that age. We further recommend that the annuity of a judge who has served for ten or more but fewer than 15 years, when payable, should be pro-rated on the basis of years of service as a proportion of 15, with the resulting fraction being multiplied by two-thirds of the salary which the judge was earning when he or she retired. We recommend that in the case of this deferred annuity payable to a former judge at age 65, there be no "banking" or accumulation of indexing credits during the deferment, and that indexing commence only when the annuity becomes payable. We recommend that should the former judge die before attaining the age of 65, his or her surviving spouse should be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% (consistent with our recommendation in Item C above) of the annuity that the former judge would have received, payable when the former judge would have reached age 65.

In our view, the deferral of the pension would discourage early retirement and the ten-year minimum qualifying period would provide an incentive for a judge to remain in office. The recommendations also reflect the spirit of recent federal and provincial legislative reforms with respect to pension benefits and standards.

E. Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada

Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada cannot elect to hold office as supernumerary judges. We appreciate that supernumerary status is inappropriate for the judges of our highest court, and inconsistent with the Court's unique role as the final arbiter of the country's legal values.

Nevertheless, we feel that by themselves, the retirement provisions of the Judges Act do not offer sufficient flexibility to the members of the Court, and that an additional retirement option should be made available. Because of the immense workload of Supreme Court judges combined with the heavy responsibility inherent in membership on that Court, we believe that a retirement option exercisable upon attaining the minimum age of 70, if the judge has served for at least ten years on the Supreme Court, is reasonable.

A Supreme Court judge who chooses to retire under this proposed provision should not be placed at a disadvantage in comparison to a judge on a lower court who elects to hold office as a supernumerary judge. Thus, a Supreme Court judge who takes up this option should be entitled to an income which is not significantly lower than what his or her salary would have been had he or she remained on the Supreme Court, and this income should continue until the judge reaches age 75, which would otherwise have been his or her mandatory retirement age.

The Commission therefore recommends that a judge who has served on the Supreme Court of Canada for at least ten years and has attained the age of 70 years be eligible to retire and receive an income payable until age 75 equal to 90% of the salary that would have been received from time to time by that judge had he or she remained on the Supreme Court, and thereafter an indexed annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office formerly held by that judge at the time he or she attains the age of 75.

In the event of the death of the retired judge before attaining age 75, 54% (60% of 90%, if our recommendation under Item C above is adopted) of the salary annexed to the office formerly held would be payable to the retired judge's surviving spouse, with the appropriate percentage for eligible children, until the time when the judge would have reached age 75, and thereafter the survivors' pensions would be in accordance with the applicable general rules.

F. Guaranteed Annuity Option

Should a judge in receipt of an annuity die, his or her surviving spouse is entitled to an annuity equal to one-half (or 60%, if our recommendation in Item C above is implemented) of the judge's annuity, pursuant to paragraph 25(1)(b) of the Judges Act. Thus, should the former judge die soon after commencing retirement, the retirement benefits to which he or she would have been entitled had he or she survived would be halved (or reduced by 40% under our recommendation) in the hands of the surviving spouse, with the former judge having received very little of what otherwise would have been payable. We believe this could result in unfair situations arising, particularly where the judge contributed towards the costs of the judicial annuity over very many years on the bench and then died shortly after retiring. We therefore recommend that a retiring judge be given the one-time option of receiving an actuarially reduced annuity for a ten-year guaranteed period. Following the expiry of the ten-year guaranteed period, a surviving spouse's pension would be reduced to 50% (or 60% pursuant to our recommendation in Item C above) of the initial (actuarially reduced) pension amount. The initial pension amount would continue for a ten-year period in favour of a surviving spouse, eligible children or the estate, as the case may be.

Our recommendation for a guaranteed annuity option is patterned after a benefit commonly available under private pension plans. There would be no additional cost to the public treasury for an option of this kind. A current sample of an actuarially reduced pension amount (based for illustration purposes on a purely hypothetical standard pension of $1,000 per month and assuming the adoption of our recommendation in Item C above), at different age levels, is shown below:

Age at Retirement and Monthly Amounts at Retirement

	Judge age 65 Spouse age 62	Judge age 70 Spouse age 67	Judge age 75 Spouse age 72
a) Joint Life reducing by 40% on judge's death	$1,000.00	$1,000.00	$1,000.00
b) Actuarial Equivalence of a joint life pension reducing by 40% at the later of the judge's death and the expiry of a 10-year guaranteed period	980.95	966.37	940.71

Note: The above figures are illustrative and based upon the 1983 Basic Mortality Table with projection scale G and 1983 year of purchase with interest at 10.75% for 20 years and 6% thereafter with a loading for expenses. This is an individual annuity purchase basis current at the time of our report. The figures also assume that the judge is a male with a spouse three years younger. The amounts will vary with assumptions used and ages and sex of the lives involved. The initial pension amount will continue for a 10-year period even if both lives die immediately.

G. Double Taxation

The salary deduction for a judge's contribution to judicial annuities and supplementary benefits is deemed to be contributed to or under a registered pension fund or plan, pursuant to subsection 29.1(3) of the Judges Act. For 1986 and subsequent taxation years, the entire contribution ($7,609 as of April 1, 1986, for a superior court judge appointed after February 16, 1975) is deductible in calculating federal income tax.[8]

Prior to 1986, only a portion of the contribution, namely $3,500, was deductible in calculating taxable income even though the annuity itself is fully taxable as income in the hands of the judge when received. Thus, the judge is potentially subject to double taxation on the amount of the contributions made in years prior to 1986 that exceeded $3,500 per annum; i.e., the amount is taxed as income as part of his or her salary in the year in which it was earned, despite the fact it was never received, and payments of the annuity are taxed again when received.

With the release of Interpretation Bulletin No. IT-167R5 in 1985, Revenue Canada's administrative practice was changed to permit a taxpayer to carry forward any registered pension plan contributions in excess of $3,500 made in respect of current service, and to deduct such excess in subsequent taxation years at the maximum rate of $3,500 per year, i.e., subject to the standard $3,500 limit. Thus, over time, all pre-1986 pension contributions that were previously ineligible for deduction will be deductible from taxable income, as long as there are sufficient years in which actual contributions are less than $3,500.

This administrative position permitting a carry forward of excess contributions will be of assistance only where contributions for a subsequent year are less than $3,500. Thus, judges will not be able to avail themselves of this deduction for amounts carried forward from years prior to 1986 while they are making current contributions in excess of $3,500 to the pension plan, since both current service contributions and excess contributions carried forward must be aggregated for purposes of the $3,500 limit. It may therefore be some years after judges have been taxed on pre-1986 excess contributions before these contributions become fully deductible, i.e., only during retirement.[9] In fact, where death occurs before all amounts have been deducted, some amounts may never be deductible.

In view of the substantial measure of relief from double taxation afforded by the 1986 amendment for post-1985 contributions and the possibility of relief, though limited, pursuant to Interpretation Bulletin No. IT-167R5 for pre-1986 contributions, we do not feel it necessary to make any recommendation for further change in the Income Tax Act with respect to pension contributions at this time. We note however that provincial tax legislation may have to be amended where applicable to achieve the same result.

We understand that in addition to the above, judges are treated for certain income tax purposes as self-employed professionals, and consequently are now permitted to deduct up to $7,500[10] for contributions to their Registered Retirement Savings Plans, with no reduction for amounts contributed towards the cost of judicial annuities and supplementary benefits pursuant to subsections 29.1(1) and (2) of the Judges Act.

H. Indexation of Annuities

The indexing of judicial salaries is provided for in the Judges Act. On the other hand, judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, are indexed pursuant to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. That Act applies to many branches of the public service, as well as to judges, and it is administered by the President of the Treasury Board.

The separate status of the judiciary, the principle of judicial independence and the unique recruiting requirements of the judiciary, all suggest that the indexation of judicial annuities should likewise be provided for in the Judges Act, so that it be distinct from the indexation of other public service pensions and to place all legislative provisions relating to judges in the one statute. For the judiciary, and uniquely so, indexation of annuities is a factor that should be regarded within the overall constitutional guarantees of security of tenure and security of salary and pension. We therefore recommend that the provisions for indexing judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, and for the return of judges' contributions, should be transferred to the Judges Act from the *Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

We do not accept the suggestion that judicial annuities be linked to the salary of a judge current from time to time, with the exception of the income which we recommend (in Item E above) be payable to former members of the Supreme Court of Canada between the ages of 70 and 75 who elect to retire following ten years of service on that Court.

I. Suspension of Surviving Spouse's Annuity on Remarriage

Subsection 25(3) of the Judges Act suspends the pension entitlement of a surviving spouse during his or her remarriage. In the event of a decree of nullity or divorce, or upon the death of the spouse of the remarriage, payment of the annuity would be resumed by virtue of subsection 25(3.1).

We feel, as did the de Grandpré Committee, that subsection 25(3) "underscores a socially inappropriate and invidious policy". Furthermore, failure to amend the Judges Act to permit continuation of survivors' benefits upon remarriage may raise serious legal questions involving equality rights. We therefore recommend the repeal of subsections 25(3) and 25(3.1) of the Judges Act.

We also recommend the removal of the words "is unmarried" from paragraph 25(1.3)(b) of the Judges Act, thereby eliminating the criterion of a child's marital status in the consideration of eligibility for benefits.

We further recommend that consequential amendments be made in the terms of eligibility for applicable group insurance, medical and other benefit plans.

The Beauregard case dealt with the constitutionality of the Judges Act amendments requiring judges to contribute towards the costs of their pensions, and the legality of requiring higher contributions from judges appointed after the date of first reading of the amendments.

2. In a letter dated February 17, 1975, sent by the then Minister of Justice to inform all judges already in office of the decision of the Government to implement the new policy, he referred to their contribution of 1½% as being "in respect of the cost of the improved annuities for widowed spouses and other dependants". Subsection 29.2(2) of the Judges Act (which provides for the return of this (1½%) contribution to the judge should the spouse pre-decease him or her and should children (if any) no longer be eligible for annuities) confirms this limited purpose of the 1½% contribution made by judges appointed before February 17, 1975.

5. We have noted that in the Beauregard decision (supra., at p. 95), the pleadings of the parties, as amended by the agreed statement of facts, are quoted as follows:

> "Upon his retirement, the Plaintiff's minimum contribution of $3,815.00 per annum with interest compounded annually using a rate of interest of ten per cent per annum will have established in the hands of the defendant a capital sum in the order of $400,000.00 an amount more than sufficient to take care of the Plaintiff's retirement annuities and the Plaintiff's supplementary retirement benefits."

Respectfully, we are curious as to whether the calculations and conclusion had ever been actuarially tested.

8. Paragraph 8(1)(m) of the Income Tax Act permits a deduction for $3,500 of contributions to a registered pension plan. Paragraph 8(1)(m.1) of the Act permits the deduction of non-voluntary contributions in excess of $3,500 to a defined benefit registered pension plan, effective for 1986 and subsequent years.

9. Revenue Canada has stated in its Interpretation Bulletin that an excess contribution may be deducted in a subsequent year (subject to the $3,500 limit) even if employment ceases prior to that year.

10. The limit of $7,500 will increase for 1988 and subsequent years if current proposals to amend the Income Tax Act are enacted.

IX. An Alternative for Fixing Judicial Compensation

Both the Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits and the Canadian Bar Association recommended to the Commission that action be taken with a view to the adoption of a formula for fixing judicial compensation similar to that in place with respect to the federal judiciary in the Australian state of New South Wales. Under the "New South Wales formula", a remuneration tribunal is required to make an annual determination with respect to the remuneration to be paid to office-holders specified in the governing legislation, which includes judges. This determination takes effect after a fixed period unless either House of Parliament passes a resolution disallowing it. This procedure is known as proceeding by way of a negative resolution.

No evidence was submitted to the Commission on the experience, favourable or otherwise, of the "New South Wales formula", particularly as it applies to the judiciary. A particular concern we have is as to the nature of the relationship between the Houses of the New South Wales Parliament and the remuneration tribunal.

The Commission is of the view that to apply the formula in Canada would in any case quite likely require an amendment to section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which requires Parliament to fix and provide the salaries, allowances and pensions of essentially all federally appointed judges. We are not convinced that the "New South Wales formula" would be such an improvement on the present system as to justify a constitutional amendment.

X. Taxation of New Judges

Identification of Problem

Newly appointed judges often face a serious cash flow problem in the two years following their appointment to the bench. The problem stems from the substantial income tax payments that may be required in those two years with respect to professional income earned prior to appointment. The problem is often compounded by actual or deemed dispositions that are unavoidable when a new judge withdraws from practice. Previously untaxed professional income would include not only professional income for the year, but also earnings from the last fiscal year-end to the date of appointment (" 'stub' period earnings"), unbilled work in progress ("WIP") and the 1971 accounts receivable reserve. Taxable capital gains and recaptured capital cost allowance on assets deemed disposed of and taxable capital gains on the disposition of the partnership interest may also result in a substantial income inclusion for tax purposes. Since these inclusions are added to judges' salaries, they are effectively taxed at the highest tax rate. The tax payments may, in some cases, exceed the net remuneration received by the judge. Appendix "F" illustrates this problem with an Ontario example that is not untypical.

Any solution must recognize that the problem is not strictly a taxation problem (although it does result in all previously untaxed amounts being taxed at the new judges' highest tax rate), but rather a cash flow problem arising from the acceleration of the recognition of income for tax purposes without a corresponding increase in cash flow. As a result, reducing the tax liability through tax shelters or Registered Retirement Savings Plans (RRSP) which require a cash outflow are not viable alternatives. While a reduction in the tax rate applicable to certain types of professional income which are included in taxable income in the year of or the year following appointment might mitigate the problem, the real solution would appear to lie in the deferment of the recognition of income to future taxation years.

Possible Solutions

Several possible solutions have been identified. The first three alternatives have been proposed in the past and may not address the real issue. These proposals together with their principal disadvantages are summarized below:

1. Tax Rate Reduction or Tax Credits

Proposal —

Certain types of deferred professional income which cause the "bunching up" of income in the year of or year following appointment would be subject to tax at one-half the normal rate of tax. Alternatively, the income would be subject to the normal rates of tax but a tax credit would be allowed to effectively reduce the tax to one-half of what would otherwise be payable on those sources of income.

Disadvantage —

While this will reduce the amount of tax payable and hence reduce the cash flow problem, it will not eliminate the problem altogether.

2. "Rollover" to RRSP

Proposal —

It has been suggested that certain amounts of deferred professional income be treated as a "retiring allowance" and therefore qualify for a transfer to a RRSP. Consequently, $3,500 per year of previous "employment" (partnership) could be transferred to a RRSP and escape immediate taxation.

Disadvantage —

Since the problem is normally one of cash flow, many newly appointed judges would not have sufficient funds to make a large RRSP contribution unless they had significant other capital.

3. Average the Tax Over the Previous Five Years

Proposal —

The aggregate of certain components of deferred professional income would be notionally added back to the incomes of the new judge for the five years prior to appointment and the additional taxes likewise aggregated as a tax liability. A variation on this proposal would be to compute the average rate of tax over the previous five years and apply this average to the previously untaxed professional income.

Disadvantage —

These proposals would not be of much benefit to most lawyers as they would likely be at the peak of their career during those years and would be taxed at the top marginal rate. Therefore averaging the income would not produce significant benefits and would do little or nothing to alleviate the cash flow problem. Also, those lawyers who had taken advantage of tax shelters might receive a benefit not available to others.

4. Permit Judges to Report Salary on a Fiscal-Year Basis

Proposal —

A new judge would have the option of reporting his or her salary income on a fiscal-year basis with the year-end corresponding to the fiscal period of the professional practice from which he or she retired. Assuming that the judge was a partner in a firm with a January 31 year-end, he or she would be allowed to report salary on that basis as well.

Disadvantage —

This would solve the major cash flow problem, but there would still be tax on unbilled WIP, 1971 receivable reserve and the other special inclusions which would come into income in the year following appointment to the bench. To be totally effective, this solution would have to be combined with a reserve, similar to that described below. This in turn might add undue complexity.

Recommended Solution — Tax Deferral over a Number of Years

The recognition of certain types of income could be deferred over a period of, say, 15 years. This could be accomplished by having all amounts included in income under the general rules and allowing a judge to claim a special reserve for deferred professional income, 1/15th of which must be included in income each year. The balance of the reserve in the year of death or retirement from the bench would be included in income in that year, and in the case of death, subsection 159(5) of the Income Tax Act ("ITA") would be made applicable, allowing payment over a maximum period of ten years. This proposal would dramatically reduce the cash flow problems in the first few years and would spread the tax burden over 15 years. The structure could be as follows:

1. Income Inclusions

It is therefore recommended that a judge be required to include in income in the year of appointment all of the following amounts relating to his or her professional practice:

(i) professional income for the fiscal year (i.e., repeal s. 24.1 of the ITA)

(ii) professional income for the "stub" period (i.e., provide that s. 99(2) and s. 96(1.1) of the ITA not be applicable to judges in year of appointment)

(iii) unbilled work in progress (special rules would be required to include this in income in the year of appointment rather than in the subsequent year)

(iv) 1971 Accounts Receivable reserve (special rules would be required to include this in income in the year of appointment rather than in the subsequent year)

(v) taxable capital gains and recaptured capital cost allowance on professional assets deemed disposed of

(vi) taxable capital gain on disposition of partnership interest, and

(vii) judge's salary for calendar year.

2. Special Reserve

A special reserve could then be claimed for such of the above amounts as are listed below. 14/15ths of such amounts would qualify for a special reserve in the year of appointment, with 1/15th included in income in each of the following 14 years. The balance of the reserve would be included in income in the year of death or retirement should either occur within 15 years of appointment.

3. Qualifying Amounts for Reserve

The amounts which would qualify for the special reserve would be:

(i) a portion of the professional income for the fiscal year of the professional practice computed as follows:

$$\text{Income for fiscal year} \times \frac{\text{\# of months in calendar year while a judge}}{\text{\# of months in fiscal year}}$$

(This is similar to s. 24.1 of the ITA.)

(ii) professional income for the "stub" period

(iii) unbilled work in progress

(iv) 1971 Accounts Receivable reserve

(v) taxable capital gains and recaptured capital cost allowance on professional assets deemed disposed of, and

(vi) taxable capital gain on disposition of partnership interest.

Rationale

The solution recommended above would, as illustrated in Appendix "G", alleviate the cash flow problem in the early years and spread the tax burden over the 15 years following appointment, which is the usual minimum period in office before retirement at full pension. This solution would also ensure that over an extended period, all income is taxed at the judge's normal tax rates.

Information Booklet

We recommend that the Minister of Justice have prepared an information booklet outlining the tax treatment of lawyers' income on their appointment to the bench together with details of judges' salaries, allowances, pensions and other benefits, and that such booklet be provided to all those who are approached to accept judicial appointment.

XI. Conclusion

Judges are not in a position to make representations to or bargain with government for adjustments to their salaries, allowances and pensions. For this reason, Parliament has provided for the appointment of Triennial Commissions. Two of the purposes of Triennial Commissions are to reduce the element of partisan politics in the adjustment of judicial compensation and to reinforce the principle of judicial independence. The Commissions make recommendations to the Minister of Justice, not as it were on the judges' behalf, but certainly mindful of the needs of an independent judiciary.

It is in this context that we have made the recommendations contained herein, and we reiterate our concern that this report be read as a whole and that the main thrust of our recommendations not be so altered as to seriously compromise their interrelationships.

XII. Summary of Recommendations

1. That Parliament either agree promptly with and implement quickly the individual recommendations of this and subsequent Triennial Commissions or, if necessary, indicate promptly its disagreement with any of such recommendations (Chapter III).

2. That a new judicial salary base be established as of April 1, 1986, by applying the Industrial Composite Index to the 1975 salary level for the years 1976 to 1986, capped by a 6% and 5% increase for 1983 and 1984, respectively. The recommended salary levels as of April 1, 1986 are as follows (Chapter IV):

Judges, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts —	$127,700
Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts —	$139,700
Judges, Supreme Court of Canada —	$151,700
Chief Justice of Canada —	$163,800

3. That the differential of $5,000 between the salaries of judges of county and district courts and those of superior courts be maintained (Chapter V).

4. That the incidental allowance be increased to $2,500 annually (Chapter VI).

5. That the removal allowance be extended to retiring judges of the three section 101 courts who are required upon appointment to change their place of residence to the vicinity of the National Capital Region, and as well to the surviving spouses and eligibile children of these judges who die in office (Chapter VII).

6. That the removal allowance permit these retiring section 101 judges, and/or the family, to move to a place of residence in any one of the ten provinces or two territories (Chapter VII).

7. That there be a requirement whereby all removal allowances must be utilized within a reasonable period following the relevant event (Chapter VII).

8. That the present rates of judicial contributions towards the costs of both statutory annuities and supplementary benefits (indexing) be maintained (including the February 16-17, 1975 contribution rate differential) and that contributions of the judiciary not be reimbursed (Chapter VIII, Item A).

9. That retirement at full pension, but not the election of supernumerary status, be permitted at the following combinations of age and years of service on the bench: 60 years of age and 20 years of service; 61 and 19; 62 and 18; 63 and 17; and 64 and 16 (Chapter VIII, Item B).

10. That the mandatory retirement age be standardized at 75 for all federally appointed judges, and that the mandatory retirement age of judges on the Federal Court of Canada, the Tax Court of Canada and the county and district courts be raised to 75 (Chapter VIII, Item B).

11. That the supernumerary provisions be standardized for all federally appointed judges except the members of the Supreme Court of Canada (Chapter VIII, Item B).

12. That the surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office be entitled to an annuity equal to 40% of the judge's salary at the time of death (Chapter VIII, Item C).

13. That the surviving spouse of a retired judge who dies while in receipt of a pension be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% of the amount of the retired judge's pension at the time of death (Chapter VIII, Item C).

14. That compound interest be payable upon the return of all contributions at a rate to be varied as and when necessary to reflect the "prescribed rates", and that if no prescribed rate was in effect, then a rate comparable to the average yield obtainable during each year on 90-day Treasury Bills should be used (Chapter VIII, Item C).

15. That the lump sum gratuity payable to the surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office be made a statutory entitlement by provision in the Judges Act (Chapter VIII, Item C).

16. That a judge who has held office for at least ten years and who retires without being entitled to an annuity should have the option of receiving an annuity, payable at age 65 should the judge retire before that age (Chapter VIII, Item D).

17. That the annuity of a judge who has served for ten or more but fewer than 15 years, when payable, should be pro-rated on the basis of years of service as a proportion of 15, with the resulting fraction being multiplied by two-thirds of the salary which the judge was earning when he or she retired (Chapter VIII, Item D.)

18. That in the case of a deferred annuity payable to a former judge at age 65, there be no "banking" or accumulation of indexing credits during the deferment, and that indexing commence only when the annuity becomes payable (Chapter VIII, Item D).

19. That should the former judge die before attaining the age of 65, his or her surviving spouse should be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% of the annuity that the former judge would have received, payable when the former judge would have reached age 65 (Chapter VIII, Item D).

20. That a judge who has served on the Supreme Court of Canada for at least ten years and has attained the age of 70 years be eligible to retire and receive an income payable until age 75 equal to 90% of the salary that would have been received from time to time by that judge had he or she remained on the Supreme Court, and thereafter an indexed annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office formerly held by that judge at the time he or she attains the age of 75 (Chapter VIII, Item E).

21. That a retiring judge be given the one-time option of receiving an actuarially reduced annuity for a ten-year guaranteed period (Chapter VIII, Item F).

22. That the provisions for indexing judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, and for the return of judges' contributions, should be transferred to the Judges Act from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (Chapter VIII, Item H).

23. That subsection 25(3) of the Judges Act, which suspends a surviving spouse's annuity in the event of remarriage, and subsection 25(3.1) be repealed (Chapter VIII, Item I).

24. That the criterion of a child's marital status be eliminated in the consideration of eligibility for benefits (Chapter VIII, Item I).

25. That amendments consequential to the two recommendations immediately above be made in the terms of eligibility for applicable group insurance, medical and other benefit plans (Chapter VIII, Item I).

26. That a judge be required to include in income in the year of appointment certain amounts relating to his or her professional practice, and that a special reserve should then be claimable for 14/15ths of such amounts in the year of appointment with 1/15th included in income in each of the following 14 years (Chapter X).

27. That an information booklet be prepared and provided to all those who are approached to accept judicial appointment (Chapter X).

All of which is respectfully submitted this 27th day of February, 1987.

1986 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

NOTICE

This Commission was appointed on September 1, 1986 by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to section 19.3 of the Judges Act, to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act to federally-appointed judges and into the adequacy of federally-appointed judges' benefits generally, including the granting of annuities provided to judges and to their surviving spouses and children.

The Commission invites written submissions in either official language concerning the matters within the Commission's terms of reference. Written submissions must reach the Commission by October 20, 1986, in eight copies. A party intending to file a written submission with the Commission may also request an opportunity to make a presentation at an oral hearing. The Commission must be notified by October 10, 1986 of the party's desire to appear at an oral hearing and if so, of the city and official language in which the presentation will be made. A party filing a written submission need not request to appear at an oral hearing, and any such request will not be considered if the party has not filed a written submission by October 20, 1986.

The Commission proposes to conduct oral hearings, if required, in the following cities and on the following dates:

Halifax	October 23
Vancouver	October 29
Edmonton	October 30
Montreal	November 21
Ottawa	November 27 and 28

Copies of the Commission's terms of reference are available upon request.

COMMISSION DE 1986 SUR LE TRAITEMENT ET LES AVANTAGES DES JUGES

AVIS

La Commission de 1986 sur le traitement et les avantages des juges a été instituée le 1er septembre 1986 par le ministre de la Justice et procureur général du Canada, en application de l'article 19.3 de la Loi sur les juges. Elle a pour mandat de déterminer si le traitement et les avantages des juges nommés par le gouvernement fédéral, et plus spécialement si les pensions auxquelles ceux-ci, leur conjoint et leurs enfants ont droit, sont satisfaisants.

La Commission invite toute personne intéressée à lui soumettre par écrit ses vues sur les sujets qu'elle a reçu pour mission d'examiner. Ces interventions doivent prendre la forme d'un document écrit, établi dans l'une ou l'autre des deux langues officielles, et être déposées auprès de la Commission en huit exemplaires au plus tard le 20 octobre 1986. Quiconque dépose un tel document écrit peut en outre demander à la Commission d'être entendu par celle-ci. En pareil cas, il convient d'aviser la Commission au plus tard le 10 octobre 1986 du souhait de présenter des observations orales, ainsi que de la ville et de la langue officielle dans lesquels cette intervention aura lieu. Il convient de noter que le dépôt de documents écrits n'oblige nullement à présenter les observations orales. Quoi qu'il en soit, nul ne se verra accorder l'autorisation d'exposer verbalement ses vues à moins d'avoir remis un document écrit à la Commission avant la date limite du 20 octobre 1986.

La Commission, s'il y a lieu, tiendra des audiences dans les villes et aux dates qui suivent :

Halifax	23 octobre
Vancouver	29 octobre
Edmonton	30 octobre
Montréal	21 novembre
Ottawa	27 et 28 novembre

Dear Allen:

On the basis of your research and the information you have obtained about the calculations made for the Commission which I chaired, I am convinced that you are right in your conclusions. In short, the philosophy and logic which our Commission applied in its report should have led to a different base salary figure for 1985. It would appear that your figure based on revised and accurate calculations of $123,500 for 1985 is correct.

Yours sincerely,

Summary of Methodology and Assumptions used for the above valuation of benefits:

A. Valuation Method:

The accrued benefit cost method (or the unit credit method) was used to value the benefits under the Judges Act.

However, in respect of the judges' disability and pre-retirement survivor benefits (available without any service requirement), only the current year cost of those benefits was included in the normal cost (on one-year term basis). Therefore, the actuarial liability ignores those benefits.

B. Assumptions:

1. Interest: 6.5%

2. Indexation: 3.5%

3. General Salary Increases: 5%

4. Promotional Salary Scale: None assumed, since the only promotions available are elevation to a higher court or to a position of Chief or Associate Chief.

5. Funding age: 75, or earlier for those judges retiring according to the assumed retirement incidence rates.

6. Rates of decrement for active contributors (derived from actual experience between 1981 and 1985, except for mortality):
   (a) Return of contributions: assumed at 0.005 from age 30 to 54 inclusive and at 0.0 thereafter
   (b) Disability: assumed at 0.001 from age 30 to 60, increasing by .002 each year up to 0.019 at age 69, and at 0.0 thereafter
   (c) Mortality: GAM83 (different for males and females)
   (d) Retirement: assumed at 0 from age 30 to 64, at 0.02 from age 65 to 69, at 0.12 at age 70 (reflecting this compulsory retirement age for some judges), and at 0.08 from age 71 to 74, all remaining judges retiring at 75. Since these rates are applied only to those judges with at least fifteen years of service, the experience rates derived from the entire population of judges were adjusted to be applicable to only those with this service qualification, in order to reproduce the same expected number of judges retiring.

7. Accrual period for retirement benefits: for purposes of the accrued benefit method, retirement benefits are assumed to accrue over the period from appointment age to assumed retirement age, varying according to the assumed retirement incidence rates (for entry age below 65, full 2/3 pensions accrue equally over each year of the applicable period; for entry age over 65, the same is true but for pro-rated benefits only).

8. Rates of decrement for pensioners:
   (a) Mortality: GAM 83 (rated up 3 years for disabled)
   (b) Remarriage of surviving spouses: rates varying by age at widowhood and duration since widowhood (e.g. in fifth year of widowhood that began at age 40: 0.023 for widows and .069 for widowers)

9. Proportions of deceased contributors leaving eligible spouse and/or children and average age of spouses and average duration of children's benefits: all varying by age at death, as shown in the following sample:

Age at Death	Proportion Leaving Eligible Spouse	Average Age of Spouse		Average Number of Eligible Children		Average Remaining Duration of Eligibility
		Female	Male	Male Contributor	Female Contributor
40	0.919	38	42	1.385	2.103	17
50	0.963	47	52	0.893	1.635	12
60	0.964	56	62	0.210	0.866	8
70	0.729	65	72	0.032	0.040	0
80	0.513	73	82	0.003	0.000	0
90	0.251	78	92	0.000	0.000	0

10. Residual benefit: ignored (considered negligible).

Taxation of New Judges

Illustration of Cash Flow Problems

Assumptions:

1. Lawyer is a member of a partnership with a January 31 year-end. His or her share of the partnership income for the year ended January 31, 1987 is $150,000. Lawyer claimed a reserve for 1971 accounts receivable of $10,000 on January 31, 1986.

2. Lawyer is appointed to the bench on June 1, 1987, at a salary of $107,500 per annum. $7,500 per annum is deducted at source under section 29.1 of the Judges Act in respect of his or her pension and is fully deductible from taxable income. Tax deductions of $36,000 are also made. Lawyer retires from law firm as of May 31, 1987. The partnership agreement specifies that the partnership is not dissolved on the retirement or admission of partners.

3. Lawyer's income for the stub period of February 1 to May 31, 1987 is $50,000. Lawyer has $25,000 of unbilled work in progress (WIP) on May 31, 1987. The partners will elect to treat these items as income to the lawyer rather than as capital.

4. Lawyer has drawn against his or her partnership income in order to make the necessary income tax instalment payments and to meet living expenses.

5. Lawyer's capital account is $50,000 which is equal to its adjusted cost base. Lawyer has borrowed $40,000 against his or her other partnership interest and this loan must be repaid on withdrawal from the firm.

6. Lawyer requires after-tax income of $56,000 to meet living expenses.

Laura Legge, Q.C.
David B. Orsborn, C.A., LL.B.

Executive Secretary: Harold Sandell

Terms of Reference

The 1989 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits was appointed on September 30, 1989, by the Honourable Doug Lewis, then Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act, and was given the following terms of reference:

> "The Commission shall, pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally.
> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the Commission shall inquire into and report upon the following matters:
> 1. The adequacy of salaries and allowances paid under the Act, having due regard for the adjustments made by R.S.C. 1985, c. 39 (3rd Supp.) and S.C. 1989, c. 8.
> 2. The granting of annuities provided to judges pursuant to section 42 of the Act.
> 3. The granting of annuities and other payments provided to surviving spouses and children having due regard for the adjustments made by R.S.C. 1985, c. 39 (3rd Supp.) and S.C. 1989, c. 8.

The Commission shall report to the Minister of Justice upon the results of the inquiry in accordance with subsection 26(2) of the Act."

The Commission held meetings and/or hearings as follows:

October 19, 1989 — Montreal
November 9, 1989 — Montreal
November 21 and 22, 1989 — Ottawa
December 14, 1989 — Montreal
January 11, 1990 — Montreal
January 31, 1990 — Montreal
March 5, 1990 — Ottawa

Notice to the Public, Submissions and Hearings

The Commission published a Notice in newspapers across Canada, inviting written submissions and presentations at oral hearings, in either official language, concerning matters within the Commissions terms of reference. Specific notice was also sent to a number of interested organizations and individuals, including all of the provincial and territorial Ministers of Justice and Attorneys General.

Copies of the Notice in English and French are reproduced as Appendix "A". The Notice was published in the following newspapers:

Written submissions were received from the groups and individuals listed in Appendix "B".

Hearings took place on November 21 and 22, 1989, at the Canada Council Hearing Room, 99 Metcalfe Street, Ottawa, and on January 31, 1990, at the offices of Stikeman, Elliott, 3900-1155 René-Lévesque Blvd. West, Montreal. The following organizations, with the counsel indicated, made oral presentations to the Commission:

1. The Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits of the Conference of Chief Justices and Chief Judges and the Canadian Judges Conference.

Counsel Appearing: D.M.M. Goldie, Q.C., Vancouver
Bernard A. Roy, Q.C., Montreal
Wilfrid Lefebvre, Q.C., Montreal

2. The Canadian Bar Association Standing Committee on Pensions for Judges' Spouses and Judges' Salaries.

Counsel Appearing: George A. Allison, Q.C., Montreal
(Chairman of the Standing Committee)
J. Patrick Peacock, Q.C., Calgary
(Immediate Past President of the Association)

Previous Committees and Commissions

The 1989 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits is the sixth federal committee or commission established in recent years to inquire into and make recommendations to the Minister of Justice with respect to judicial salaries, allowances and benefits. It is the third "Triennial Commission" appointed pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act.

In September, 1974, a Special Advisory Committee, under the chairmanship of the Honourable Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, a retired member of the Supreme Court of Canada, reported to the Minister. The Dorfman Committee on Judicial Compensation and Related Matters, under the chairmanship of Irwin Dorfman, Q.C., (hereinafter, the "Dorfman Committee") reported to the Minister in November, 1978. The de Grandpré Committee on Judicial Annuities, under the chairmanship of Jean de Grandpré, Q.C. (hereinafter, the "de Grandpré Committee"), reported in December, 1981. The 1983 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the first of the "Triennial Commissions" established pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act, was chaired by the Honourable Otto Lang, P.C., Q.C. (hereinafter, the "Lang Commission") and it reported to the Minister in October, 1983. The 1986 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the second "Triennial Commission", was chaired by H. Donald Guthrie, Q.C. (hereinafter, the "Guthrie Commission") and reported to the Minister in February, 1987.

Acknowledgements

The Commission wishes to thank Pierre Garceau, Q.C., Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, and the members of his staff, in particular Louise Fox and Wayne Osborne, for their support throughout the Commission's mandate.

We also thank G.W. Poznanski, F.C.I.A., F.S.A., Chief Actuary, P. Treuil, F.C.I.A., F.S.A., Director, Government Services Division and L.M. Cornelis, F.C.I.A., F.S.A., Chief, Government Services Division, of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, for their valuable actuarial assistance.

The Commission is most grateful to Harold Sandell of the Department of Justice in Ottawa who was assigned to it as Executive Secretary. Mr. Sandell's enthusiasm and dedicated service as well as encyclopedic knowledge of the Canadian legal and judicial systems rendered our task much easier and made it possible for us to complete our mandate ahead of schedule.

II. INTRODUCTION

The primary role of the judiciary is to safeguard the supremacy of the law and to uphold its rule. In recognition of that role, the authors of our Constitution, as well as the executive and legislative branches of government and the courts, have been conscious of the need to preserve and enhance the independence of judges. As a result, the principle of the independence of the judiciary is imbedded in the constitutional history of Canada. The Constitution Act, 1867 specifically acknowledges the concept of judicial independence through the Judicature provisions respecting tenure and removal and the fixing and payment of salaries, annuities and allowances.

The seemingly ponderous process and elaborate institutions whereby judicial salaries, allowances and annuities are considered, determined, fixed, provided and paid, serve a very clear purpose. They are all designed to preclude the arbitrary interference of the executive branch in the matter of judicial compensation — a statutory and independent Triennial Commission to make recommendations to the Minister of Justice of Canada following its thorough examination of the subject; Parliament having to enact public statutes, as required by our Constitution, to fix and provide judges' salaries, allowances and annuities; and the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, another creature of statute, to administer to, and pay, the judges and their survivors. They all underscore and reflect the fundamental importance which both the principle and the manifestations of judicial independence hold in our free and democratic society.

This report and our recommendations to the Minister of Justice comprise the first step in the process. We have undertaken this task mindful of the important objective which it serves.

III. THE REVIEW PROCESS

Section 26 of the Judges Act requires the Minister of Justice of Canada in every third year to appoint not fewer than three and not more than five commissioners "to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under [the] Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally." The commissioners are required within six months of their appointment to submit a report to the Minister "containing such recommendations as they consider appropriate". The Minister is required to "cause the report to be laid before Parliament not later than the tenth sitting day of Parliament after he receives it."

Parliament has seen fit to impose strict time limits on the entire Triennial Commission process. In our view this reflects Parliament's intentions with regard to the significance of that process and distinguishes it from non-statutory ad hoc commissions generally. The imposition of statutory time limits also underscores the critical importance of a prompt response to the recommendations of Triennial Commissions.

The acknowledged purpose of the Triennial Commission review process is to reduce the element of partisan politics in the determination and adjustment of judicial compensation and to reinforce the principle of judicial independence by obtaining the recommendations of persons with experience and expertise after a full and independent review. The process was instituted by Parliament in the public interest, which can only be fulfilled if the process functions effectively. Failure to adopt the recommendations of Triennial Commissions renders meaningless this independent review process and effectively thwarts the evident intention of Parliament.

The alternative to the Triennial Commission process would be to put the judiciary in the invidious position of having to engage in constant and ongoing discussions with the executive branch of government with regard to salaries and benefits. As that same branch of government also appears frequently in the courts, the mere appearance of the judges having to negotiate with the executive branch would only erode the public perception of judicial independence.

The Triennial Commission review process cannot prevent this highly undesirable result if the reports of the Commissions are not acted upon positively and with reasonable promptness. Otherwise, the integrity of the review process would be irreparably impaired, which not only would defeat the intentions of Parliament, but also would seriously attenuate the only means available to judges to provide meaningful input with regard to compensation and benefit issues.

We therefore recommend that the Minister of the day promptly inform Parliament, following the tabling of the reports of this and subsequent Triennial Commissions, as to what action the Government proposes to take with regard to their individual recommendations or, if necessary, indicate promptly the Government's disagreement with any of such recommendations.

We also recommend that whenever legislation to implement Triennial Commission recommendations is introduced in Parliament, the Government should proceed to ensure its quick passage.

IV. JUDICIAL SALARIES

The meaning of "judicial independence" is evolving. Traditionally, it has referred to the independence of the individual judge to decide an issue without interference, which implies that once a lawyer has been appointed to the bench he or she severs all professional and partisan connections and, dependent for a livelihood on his or her judicial salary alone, the judge dispenses justice with no other consideration than the facts as he or she finds them and the law as he or she interprets it.

Recently, the Supreme Court of Canada has broadened the meaning of the principle to include not only conditions which apply to judges as individuals, but conditions which must apply to the bench as a whole in its relationships to the other institutions of authority, in particular the executive and legislative branches of government.

The Court identified three objective criteria or conditions which it termed essential to the existence of an independent tribunal (in the context of paragraph 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms). These conditions are security of tenure, financial security and the institutional independence of the tribunal with respect to matters of administration bearing directly on the exercise of the judicial function.[1] The Court proceeded to define the second of these conditions, financial security, to mean security of salary or other remuneration and, where appropriate, security of pension.[2]

It is clear that financial security is one of the substantive cornerstones of judicial independence and of the public's perception of that independence; and the perception, as we know, is no less important than the independence itself. The Supreme Court of Canada, in the more recent Beauregard decision, affirmed this essentiality of financial security to the concept of the independence of the judiciary, and traced its constitutional roots to the Act of Settlement of 1701.[3]

The requirement for financial security within the context of judicial independence is apparent in both the design and content of the compensation scheme for federally appointed judges. The entrenchment, in section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, of the requirement that Parliament fix and provide the salaries, allowances and pensions of judges, is the most discernible manifestation. Others include the Triennial Commission review process, the statutory annual salary adjustment (section 25 of the Judges Act) and the administration of Part I of the Judges Act by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs instead of by the Deputy Minister of Justice (who is also the Deputy Attorney General of Canada).

Another practical aspect of the reality and perception of judicial independence is that the actual monetary amounts involved should be sufficient to preserve the role, dignity and quality of our judges, and to reflect the esteem which the office deserves. A judge and his or her family are entitled to a standard of living commensurate with their position in Canadian society. They must be and be seen by society to be financially secure, particularly in view of the statutory requirement (at section 55 and subsection 57(1) of the Judges Act) that a judge devote himself or herself exclusively to judicial duties and not engage in any occupation or business.

Furthermore, the judicial salary and benefit package should serve to make appointment to the bench sufficiently attractive to the best qualified lawyers, and to enhance the morale of those who have accepted appointment.

Both the 1983 (Lang) and 1986 (Guthrie) Commissions recommended that the salary level established by amendments to the Judges Act in 1975 be restored by increasing salaries to allow for inflation since 1975, with a cap of 6% and 5% in 1983 and 1984, respectively, to reflect the limit on salary adjustments for all public servants during those two years under the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act. (This salary level has been described as "1975 equivalence").

The salary increase granted by Parliament in 1985 (Bill C-78) as a result of the Lang Commission, went only part way to 1975 equivalence. The three-stage increase enacted in 1987 (Bill C-88), as a result of the Guthrie Commission, established salaries at the levels recommended by that Commission ($127,700 for superior court judges), but delayed full implementation to April 1, 1988, instead of making the entire increase effective on April 1, 1986, as recommended. The effect of that delay was that the salary of a superior court judge as of April 1, 1986 became $115,000, instead of the recommended $127,700; as of April 1, 1987 it became $121,300, instead of $131,200; and as of April 1, 1988 it became $127,700, instead of $135,500.

The present salary of $133,800, which became effective on April 1, 1989, is $8,200 below 1975 equivalence, which would be achieved at an April 1, 1989 salary level of $142,000. This shortfall resulted from delay in the face of continuing inflation, and the fact that the statutory salary indexing factor for 1987 and 1988 was subsumed in and superseded by the three-stage increase enacted by Bill C-88. Furthermore, the salary base level upon which the statutory indexing formula has been applied in other years was never raised sufficiently to reach 1975 equivalence.

The reasons given by the Lang and Guthrie Commissions for recommending 1975 equivalence are still very much applicable, and we fully subscribe to them. Both previous Triennial Commissions relied in part on the fact that the salary level being recommended for superior court judges would restore the historical relationship of rough equivalence between the salaries of judges and those of senior deputy ministers in the federal Public Service. The salary level established by the 1975 amendments to the Judges Act did not result in a new, historically high, salary level for judges, but simply allowed for inflation that had occurred in the years prior to 1975. The fairness of that level has not been disputed.

We note that 1975 equivalence would bring judges to within 2% of the mid-point of the salaries of the most senior level (DM-3) of federal deputy ministers. The DM-3 mid-point, we believe, reflects what the market place expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by deputy ministers and judges.[4] The salaries of superior court judges are now materially below that mid-point and this situation should be rectified. It might be noted that failure to maintain 1975 equivalence from 1976 to 1989 has resulted in an accumulated shortfall for a superior court judge serving during those years of over $230,000.

The recommended levels of salary as of April 1, 1989 are therefore as follows:

- Judges, Tax Court of Canada, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts— $142,000

[4] The compensation and terms and conditions of employment for senior managers in the federal Public Service, including deputy ministers, are the subject of annual advisory reports prepared for the Prime Minister by the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service (Mr. James W. Burns, Chairman).

• Chief Justices (Judge) and Associate Chief Justices (Judge), Tax Court of Canada, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts—	$155,300
• Judges, Supreme Court of Canada—	$168,600
• Chief Justice of Canada—	$182,100

V. SALARY DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN THE COUNTY AND DISTRICT COURTS AND THE SUPERIOR COURTS

Bill C-78 (which received Royal Assent on December 12, 1985 as Chapter 48 of the Statutes of Canada, 1985) established as at April 1, 1985, an absolute differential of $5,000 between the salaries of judges of the county and district courts and those of superior courts. The Guthrie Commission recommended that the differential of $5,000 be maintained.

The matter arises again but in somewhat changed circumstances. Merger of the section 96 (of the Constitution Act, 1867) trial courts has occurred or is imminent in all provinces except Nova Scotia.

Furthermore, the salaries of judges and chief judges of the Tax Court of Canada, which is not a superior court, were increased in 1988 to the same levels as those of judges and chief justices of the superior courts. The salaries in the Tax Court had previously been at the same levels as those for judges and chief judges of the county and district courts.

We believe that there is no justification for different salary levels as between federally-appointed trial judges in the different courts.

We therefore recommend that the salaries of judges and chief judges of the county and district courts be increased to the salary levels of judges and chief justices of the superior courts. The result of such a recommendation, effective April 1, 1989, should be:

- Judges, county and district courts— $142,000
- Chief Judges and Associate Chief Judges, county and district courts— $155,300

VI. INDEXATION OF JUDGES' SALARIES

Judges' salaries are indexed pursuant to section 25 of the Judges Act. Under the section 25 formula, judicial salaries are automatically increased on April 1 of each year by the percentage amount which is equal to the change in the Industrial Aggregate Index of the previous year in comparison to the year before the previous year, to a maximum of 7%.

The Industrial Aggregate Index is published by Statistics Canada under the authority of the Statistics Act, and was adopted by statutory amendment in 1987 in lieu of the Industrial Composite Index as the basis for the salary adjustment formula for judges. The Industrial Aggregate was already in use for purposes of adjusting benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, and salaries under the Parliament of Canada Act and the Salaries Act. We note that in January 1990, the identical salary adjustment formula that applies to judges, namely the percentage change in the Industrial Aggregate Index to a maximum of 7%, was adopted by statutory amendment as the salary adjustment formula for the Governor General.

We feel that the percentage change in the Industrial Aggregate serves as a better adjustment formula for judicial salaries than would the Consumer Price Index. That is the case regardless of whether the Consumer Price Index would be used alone or in conjunction with the Industrial Aggregate Index on an averaging basis. We feel it is fairer and more consistent to tie judicial salary increases to variations in Canadian wages and salaries generally, as represented by the Industrial Aggregate Index, than to variations in the cost of living or the purchasing power of the dollar, as represented by the Consumer Price Index. Furthermore, the Industrial Aggregate Index, used alone, serves as the basis for the statutory salary adjustment formulae that apply to the Governor General, Lieutenant Governors, Senators, Members of the House of Commons and members of the federal Cabinet. We do not see the need or the desirability of incorporating the Consumer Price Index into the judicial salary adjustment formula.

The salary adjustment formula for judges, as well as for all of the other offices referred to in the previous paragraph, includes a cap on annual salary increases of 7%. We feel that there are sound public policy reasons for maintaining a cap as part of an adjustment formula that provides for automatic annual salary increases. To put it simply, removing the cap would complicate the government's efforts to combat the wage-price spiral that affects virtually all periods of high inflation. Therefore, we are opposed to removing the 7% cap from the salary adjustment formula in section 25 of the Judges Act.

For the same reasons, we do not support any form of "banking" or "carry-forward" or inflation adjustment credits in years when the percentage change in the Industrial Aggregate Index exceeds 7%, which credits could then be applied to the salary increase in a future year or years when the Index fell below 7%. Moreover, in view of the Triennial Commission review process which (according to section 26 of the Judges Act) includes an examination of the adequacy of judicial salaries, we feel that a "banking" or "carry-forward" provision would be somewhat redundant.

VII. ALLOWANCE FOR NORTHERN JUDGES

The Judges Act was amended in 1981 to provide a non-accountable yearly allowance of $4,000 to each of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory and the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories, as compensation "for the higher cost of living" in the two territories.

Subsection 27(2) of the Judges Act was amended in 1989 to increase the allowance to $6,000, at the same time as the annual allowance for incidental expenditures for all judges was increased from $1,000 to $2,500 per judge.[5] The reason for both increases was inflation.

In view of the 1989 increase in the allowance for northern judges, we do not recommend a further increase in that allowance for the present.

We are also opposed to extending the northern allowance to judges who are resident in remote and/or isolated areas within the provinces. This is partly due to the difficulty of determining the appropriate cut-off point for such an extension, and partly from a sensibility that the section 96 judges within a province should be accorded equal treatment to avoid problems relating to their independence and morale.

[5] The Commission notes that on December 21, 1989, the Governor in Council approved an Order in Council (P.C. 1989-2560) to amend the Judges Act (Removal Allowance) Order to allow home sale assistance to be paid to federally appointed judges. The Order was approved under the authority of subsection 40(2) of the Judges Act. Home sale assistance provides for the payment of up to 10% of the fair market value of the principal residence of a judge who suffers a loss on its sale occasioned by the necessity that he or she move elsewhere in Canada as a consequence of the requirements of service on the bench. The Commission endorses this amendment.

VIII. REPRESENTATIONAL ALLOWANCE

Chief justices and chief judges of both the section 96 and section 101 courts perform a number of functions and obligations in a representative role on behalf of their respective courts. As titular head of a court, or as symbolic head of the judiciary at the federal or provincial level, a chief justice or chief judge is invited or expected to attend state and other official and semi-official functions both within and outside the court's jurisdiction, and may be requested or expected to host certain functions, particularly those involving visiting judicial dignitaries from other countries.

Prior to 1975, expenses incurred by a chief justice or chief judge in connection with such activities were either paid personally or recovered from the departmental budget with the express permission of the Minister of Justice. The former solution was unfair, the latter undignified at best.

As a result, by virtue of amendments to the Judges Act in 1975, and subsequent amendments, an allowance is provided for representational expenses actually incurred by the chief justice or chief judge of a section 96 or section 101 court or by a judge acting on his or her behalf, by a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, and by the senior judges of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory and of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories. The annual aggregate representational allowance permitted for each eligible judge pursuant to subsection 27(7) of the Judges Act is currently as follows:

(a)	the Chief Justice of Canada	$10,000
(b)	each puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada	$5,000
(c)	the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada and the Chief Justice of each province	$7,000
(d)	each other chief justice or chief judge of a court	$5,000
(e)	each senior judge of a territorial supreme court	$5,000

The representational allowance therefore serves to reimburse a judge for expenses actually incurred by him or her for travelling, hospitality and related amounts in connection with the extra-judicial obligations and responsibilities that devolve upon the judge by virtue of the office.

In 1985, the Judges Act was amended to permit the reimbursement of expenses incurred by or on behalf of a spouse, in accompanying a chief justice or other judge entitled to the benefit of the allowance, at certain official and semi-official events. The use of the judge's representational allowance to reimburse his or her spouse is envisaged to cover situations where the presence or active participation of the spouse is required or expected. Examples of such situations are opening of the legislatures, opening of the courts, state dinners, entertainment of foreign legal dignitaries and certain conferences and seminars. The spouse's expenses are subject to the overall representational allowance limit applicable to the judge.

The amounts provided for representational allowances have not been adjusted since 1985, when the allowance was extended to cover the spouse's expenses. The amounts provided under the allowance have become generally inadequate, and some chief justices are being required to absorb expenses incurred on behalf of the court or on behalf of the federal government or of a provincial government.

We therefore recommend that the annual representational allowance be increased to $15,000 for the Chief Justice of Canada, to $10,000 for the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada and the Chief Justice of each province, and to $8,000 for each other chief justice, chief judge, senior judge or judge presently entitled to receive it. We further recommend that the Judges Act be amended to authorize the Minister of Justice of Canada to approve the payment of additional amounts as representational allowance in any given year.

IX. CONFERENCE ALLOWANCE

Members of the federally appointed judiciary are required by federal or provincial law to attend annually a number of meetings relating to the administration of justice on their courts. In addition, there are a number of meetings, conferences and seminars relating to the administration of justice which members of the judiciary may be authorized by law to attend. Expenses incurred in connection with such meetings are properly reimbursable as a conference allowance pursuant to subsection 41(1) of the Judges Act. No ceiling is placed upon the amounts which may be reimbursed in any one year.

A number of other seminars, conferences and meetings are arranged by the county, district or superior court judges on a regional and a national basis for the purpose of exchanging information on court procedures, new developments in the law, and judicial education generally. As well, universities, law reform commissions and other organizations, including the new Canadian Judicial Centre, schedule conferences or seminars on particular areas of the law where it is beneficial that members of the judiciary be permitted to participate or to act as panelists or resource persons. Until 1975, there was no provision for the payment of expenses in connection with the attendance by a judge at any of these categories of conferences. Since the participation of the judiciary would enhance the quality of judicial services, subsection 41(2) [as it now is] of the Judges Act was enacted in that year to permit the reimbursement of reasonable expenses incurred in attending such conferences, subject to the certification of such expenses by the chief justice of the court of which the judge was a member, and to a fixed maximum for each court. This maximum was established as $250 per judge per year, with provision, however, for the reimbursement of expenses in excess of this amount (payable as an aggregate per court) with the approval of the Minister of Justice of Canada.

The section 41(2) conference allowance was amended in 1977 to permit reimbursement of the cost of obtaining materials or proceedings of such meetings, conferences and seminars in lieu of actual attendance. Also in that year, a special conference allowance of $1,000 per judge per year was established for the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

In 1980, the annual allowance was increased with respect to judges of the county, district and superior courts from $250 per judge to $350 per judge, payable as an aggregate per court. In view of the disadvantage experienced by some of the smaller courts in having the allowance payable on the basis of the number of judges on the court, a minimum per court was established of $3,000 per year. This minimum permitted the smaller courts to send their members to conferences which they might otherwise have been unable to attend by reason of lack of funds.

In 1985, in view of the continuing increases in the costs of travel, the allowance was increased by establishing a multiplier of $500 per judge on a court, with a minimum of $5,000 per court per year.

The establishment of the conference allowance has undoubtedly enabled federally appointed judges to improve their legal skills and knowledge through attendance at court meetings, law conferences and seminars. Frequent changes in the law brought about by judicial decisions due in large part to the advent of the Charter, and by legislative enactments, make it incumbent on all federally appointed judges to attend and participate in conferences and seminars to remain abreast of the law and to exchange ideas with their colleagues and members of the bar across the country.

However, the cost of travel and hotel accommodation has increased dramatically in recent years. Due to the present limitation of $500 per judge on a court (with a minimum of $5,000 for any one court), the medium-sized and larger courts in particular have had to establish individual priorities for attendance at such conferences among a great number of judges.

In order that judges maintain their standard of excellence, we recommend that the annual conference allowance for the Supreme Court of Canada be increased to $1,500 per judge and the annual allowance for all other courts be increased to $750 per judge with a minimum of $7,500 per court.

X. JUDICIAL ANNUITIES

Annuities Granted to Judges

Section 42 of the Judges Act provides for the granting of an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office of a judge at the time of his or her resignation, removal or ceasing to hold office, to a judge who

(a) has continued in office for fifteen years and has attained the age of 65, if he or she resigns his or her office;

(b) has continued in office for fifteen years but has not attained the age of 65, if his or her resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest;

(c) resigns or is removed as a result of becoming afflicted with a permanent disability preventing him or her from executing his or her office; or

(d) has reached the mandatory retirement age of 75, if he or she has held office for at least ten years.

If a judge reaches the mandatory retirement age without having served for ten years, he or she is entitled to an annuity pro-rated on the basis of years of completed service (to the nearest one-tenth of a year) as a proportion of ten years.

Supernumerary Judges

In addition, the option exists pursuant to sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Judges Act, for a judge to elect supernumerary status. Under this arrangement, a puisne judge who is at least 65 years of age and has served as a federally appointed judge for a minimum of fifteen years, or has reached the age of 70 years and has held office for at least ten years, may opt to continue in office (with a reduced caseload in most instances) while remaining entitled to full salary until the judge is mandatorily retired or otherwise leaves the bench, at which time he or she would receive the annuity. A Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice who elects supernumerary status is entitled to receive the salary of a puisne judge during his or her supernumerary service, although the subsequent annuity is based on the salary then in effect of a Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice. The supernumerary programme promotes continuity on the bench, while making available positions which could not otherwise be filled until the retirement of the incumbents. All federally appointed judges except the members of the Supreme Court of Canada are entitled to opt for supernumerary status. Approximately 12% of the federally appointed bench are currently supernumerary judges.

A. Judges' Contributions toward Annuities

In 1975, judges for the first time were required to contribute toward the cost of their statutory annuities. The 1975 amendments to the Judges Act (now section 50) require judges who were appointed before February 17, 1975 (the date of First Reading of the amendments) to contribute at a rate of 1½% of their annual salary to help defray the cost of improved annuities for their surviving spouses and other dependants. These judges are not required to contribute in respect of their own annuities or for indexing the pensions to the cost of living. Judges appointed on or after February 17, 1975 must contribute at a rate of 6% of annual salary toward the cost of their own annuities as well as those of their surviving spouses and other dependants. They also contribute a further 1% of salary to help pay for indexing the pensions to the cost of living. Pension indexing is provided for by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. S-24).

The constitutional authority of Parliament to compel reasonable contributions by judges toward their annuities, as well as the legality of the differential in contribution rates which is based on date of appointment to the bench, were settled by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Beauregard decision.[6]

For more than a century following Confederation, and for many years prior to Confederation, annuities were paid to Canada's federally appointed judges who had retired, or who had resigned after suffering a permanent disabling infirmity. These annuities were paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Until the enactment of section 50 of the Judges Act in 1975, no contribution was required from the judges for the purpose of funding their annuities.

Reference has already been made to section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, under which Parliament is required to fix and provide the salaries, allowances and annuities for judges. By an Act which received Royal Assent on May 22, 1868, Parliament acted pursuant to section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 by fixing and providing the salaries, allowances, annuities and other sums of money payable to the judiciary in the Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in accordance with the schedules annexed to that Act.

With reference to annuities, it was provided that in case any of the judges therein mentioned "has continued in the Office of Judge of one or more of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity or of the Court of Vice-Admiralty, in any of the said Provinces for fifteen years or upwards, or becomes afflicted with some permanent infirmity, disabling him from the due execution of his office, then, in case such Judge resigns his office, Her Majesty may, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada, reciting such period of office or permanent infirmity, grant unto such Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor or Judge an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office he held at the time of his resignation, to commence immediately after his resignation, and to continue thenceforth during his natural life, and to be payable pro rata for any period less than a year, during such continuance, out of any unappropriated monies forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada."[7]

These salaries and annuities were to replace the salaries and retirement allowances which had been previously provided under Chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of the former Province of Canada.

None of the enactments of the Parliament of Canada in pursuance of the provision of section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in the years between 1868 and 1975, a period of 107 years, required any contribution from the judges for the purpose of funding their annuities. Neither was any contribution required from judges in respect of death benefits to spouses and dependent children.

Before March 1961, the judges of the superior and county courts were not subject to a compulsory retirement age. Compulsory retirement at age 75 was introduced by a constitutional amendment enacted by the United Kingdom Parliament on December 20, 1960, to take effect on March 1, 1961.[8] A decade later, the retirement age for county and district court judges was fixed at age 70 except for judges of the county and district courts who held office on October 6, 1971, for whom the retirement age remained at 75.

[8] 9 Eliz. II, c.2 (U.K).

All this changed with the introduction on February 17, 1975, of the Superannuation Amendment, 1975, which received Royal Assent on December 20, 1975.[9] The introduction of section 50 into the Judges Act in 1975 provided an unprecedented change in the remuneration of Canada's superior and county court judges. It provided that judges who had been appointed prior to February 17, 1975, would be required to contribute 1½% of salary to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Judges appointed after February 16, 1975, would be required to contribute 6% of salary to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, in addition, ½% to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account (to help pay for indexing the annuities to the cost of living), to be increased in January 1977 to 1%, making the total contribution for these judges 7% of salary.

By a letter from the then Minister of Justice dated February 17, 1975, judges then in office were informed that their contributions of 1½% were "in respect of the improved annuities for widowed spouses and other dependents". The letter also indicated that "with respect to a person appointed to judicial office after to-day" the annual contribution towards the annuities that may be paid subsequently to the judge as well as to his dependents would be fixed at 6½%, to rise to 7% on January 1, 1977.

This development has been the subject of criticism in the reports of two previous advisory committees and one Triennial Commission appointed by the Minister of Justice. In fact, the issue of judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities has been studied by every committee and commission appointed subsequent to the 1975 amendments to the Judges Act. The Dorfman Committee (1978), the de Grandpré Committee (1981) and the Lang Commission (1983) recommended either reducing (Dorfman and Lang) or eliminating (de Grandpré) contributions. The Guthrie Commission (1986) recommended that judicial contributions remain at their present levels.

We agree with the recommendation of the de Grandpré Committee that judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities, survivors' benefits and the indexing of annuities be eliminated, and in doing so we subcribe to the reasons given by that Committee.

We note that the effect of the 1975 change was to engender a disruption in the morale of the judges and disharmony between what was perceived by many as two categories of judges. Judges who carried the same workload and often occupied adjoining offices suddenly found that the net salaries which they received were no longer the same. This malaise continues today, only now the difference in annual contributions is over $7300. As the Dorfman Committee stated at page 31 of its report:

> "The Committee is troubled by the effects of the amendments to the Judges Act in 1975, which required contributions to the Consolidated Revenue Fund from those appointed after the 16th day of February, 1975, of six per cent of total salary, and from those appointed prior to the 17th day of February, 1975, of one and one-half per cent of total salary. The amendment had the effect of reducing the salaries granted to judges and did so unevenly. The disparities thus created in the net income of judges presiding in the same courts has had a disquieting effect on a number of judges...".

In a letter dated December 20, 1979 (see Appendix "C"), the Minister of Justice at the time, Senator Jacques Flynn, advised the judges that the Government had earlier taken the decision to introduce on December 17, 1979, amendments to the Judges Act which would have implemented the recommendations of the Dorfman Committee. He expressed regret, however, that the dissolution of Parliament had intervened to prevent the implementation of that decision.

The de Grandpré Committee, at pages 14 and 15 of its report, stated that:

> "... it has resulted in two classes of judges, but for remuneration purposes alone. It is clear that these judges will frequently be doing not only the same kind of work, but indeed, the same work, hearing the same case. Their powers, prerogatives and status are identical. Until 1975, the compensation conditions of judges at the same level of court were identical. Now it is clear that on an appeal heard by a panel of three judges, one or two may be receiving 5.5% less in net compensation because they were more recently appointed and therefore contribute 7%, rather than 1.5%. Surely, judicial compensation should be on a footing of equal pay for equal work. Furthermore, this resulting differential has been destructive of morale."

The Lang Commission also referred to the disruptive nature of the uneven contributions required from judges based on the date of appointment to the bench. At page 9 of its report, the Lang Commission stated:

> "The Commission views judges' annuities as an important part of their total compensation. We do not consider the issue of contributions to annuities as in any way affecting the independence of the judiciary. As has been the conclusion of previous advisory committees, however, we consider a long-standing differential between judges doing the same work to be inappropriate, and as leading to the creation of two classes of judges."

We agree with the above noted comments from the Dorfman, de Grandpré and Lang reports. We would also emphasize that even the Guthrie Commission, which recommended maintenance of the status quo in so far as judicial contributions are concerned, predicated that recommendation on the totality of its recommendations being adopted, which they were not.

We believe that a further effect of the introduction in 1975 of judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities was that it detracted from the non-contributory annuity conditions which, before 1975, had served as an attractive inducement to accomplished and experienced lawyers to forego the most lucrative years of private practice and accept appointment to the bench.

In providing life-long security, the non-contributory annuity was a reasonable trade-off for a lawyer whose income from practice was virtually always higher than the salary of a judge. The value of the annuity as an inducement to judicial office was substantially reduced by the imposition of contributions.

The judges were never compensated for the loss of the contribution-free annuity benefit. It should not be thought that the increases in judicial salaries which took effect in 1975 had the effect of offsetting in part the requirement of deductions for the cost of annuities. The salary level for judges had been seriously eroded by inflation during the period from 1971 to 1975, and the salary increase to $53,000 in 1975 merely coincided almost exactly with that which would have resulted from adjusting the 1971 salary by the change in the Consumer Price Index. The result of the deduction for the cost of annuities, therefore, was to build into the salary structure a reduction of 1½% for the pre-1975 judges and 7% for those appointed after February 16, 1975, thereby reducing salaries below the level (as adjusted by the annual percentage change in the Industrial Aggregate Index) that had been accepted in 1975 as fair in order to allow for inflation since 1971.

There are further compelling reasons why judges' annuities should be non-contributory. These reasons lie in the nature of judicial annuities, which do not derive from a funded pension plan.

Judges in Canada, like their counterparts in other jurisdictions with the traditions of the English commmon law, are generally appointed from about the mid-point and beyond in their legal careers from those lawyers who have established reputations for professional ability (see Appendix "D"). They are not career judges, unlike the case in many civil law jurisdictions, and they do not serve in the office for a period long enough to provide, by their contributions, for a funded pension. Essentially, the size of annuities for judges and their surviving spouses does not depend upon length of service or the total contributions made by a judge. These contributions do not vest, and they are not and cannot be directed into a funded pool designed to pay for judicial annuities.

It is clear that the attributes of the payments made to retired judges or surviving spouses are more in the nature of annuities than pensions. As such, treating or even conceiving of these payments as pensions merely clouds the issue of responsibility for contributing to them. It follows that judicial annuities cannot and should not be equated with the pension plans of employees in the public and private sectors, and these differences would remove any valid reason for delaying the improvements in judges' annuities recommended by this report on the basis of the need to consider broader reforms of public service pension arrangements.

It might be noted that historically, federal Public Service pension plans have been contributory from at least as early as 1870 whereas judges, as we have seen, enjoyed non-contributory annuities until 1975. This historical difference is eminently reasonable and justifiable on the basis of the unique status of judges in our society and their position of independence from the other branches of government.

The Commission has also considered, within the context of contributions to judges' and survivors' annuities, the matter of contributions toward the cost of supplementary retirement benefits, commonly referred to as the indexing feature of annuities. Like the de Grandpré Committee, this Commission believes that the full package of retirement security benefits should be non-contributory and that as a matter of consistency, judges should not contribute towards the supplementary retirement benefits. We note that judges and the Governor General, alone out of all the groups whose pensions were indexed under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, were not required to contribute towards indexing of annuities when the new benefit was introduced in 1970. Judges appointed prior to February 17, 1975, still do not contribute towards the cost of indexing yet they continue to be entitled to the indexing benefit. So the distinction between judges and other groups who have the indexing benefit under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act already exists.

A further reason why the Commission feels it is reasonable at this time to remove the requirement that judges contribute toward the cost of annuities is that upon the enactment and coming into force of Bill C-52, which comprises amendments to the Income Tax Act introduced in the House of Commons on December 13, 1989, judges would lose all but $600 of their tax deductible "contribution room" toward a Registered Retirement Savings Plan (R.R.S.P.). Judges are currently entitled to contribute toward an R.R.S.P., and deduct for income tax purposes, up to the limit applicable to self-employed taxpayers (currently $7,500, and expected to increase to $15,500 by 1995) and they have had this right since 1978. Pursuant to the proposed subsection 8308(9) of the Regulations under the new Income Tax Act amendments, the deductibility of their R.R.S.P. contribution would be limited to $600 a year.

There are a number of reasons why an R.R.S.P. has been attractive to a judge. The most important reason is to supplement the annuity of a surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office (where the annuity is one-third of the judge's salary) or to supplement the annuity of a surviving spouse on the death of a retired judge (where the annuity is reduced by 50%). The deductibility and flexibility in amount of the R.R.S.P. contribution is also a positive factor in attracting qualified lawyers to the bench.

For the individual judge who is now contributing to an R.R.S.P., the implementation of the Bill C-52 tax proposals would mean the virtual elimination of a benefit heretofore available to judges — the right to accumulate tax deferred benefits to supplement their annuities and the reduced annuities of their surviving spouses. We feel that the elimination of judicial contributions toward annuities would help to compensate judges for the imminent loss of almost all of their long-standing entitlement to tax deductible R.R.S.P. contributions.

The imposition of judicial contributions in 1975, which was contrary to the traditions of the common law judiciary, also sets our federally appointed judges apart from their counterparts in the United Kingdom, the United States and Australia, whose annuities are contribution free.

For all of these reasons, the Commission is of the view that the restoration of non-contributory annuities is correct from the point of view of pensions policy; as a matter of history and tradition; and from the unique perspective of judicial compensation, recruitment and retention, with respect to which it would serve as an inducement for lawyers to accept appointment to the bench and for serving judges to delay their retirement and continue to provide public service.

With regard to this latter point, delaying judicial retirement, we would point out that some judges who are entitled to resign with a full annuity of two-thirds of salary, but have not yet reached the mandatory retirement age of 75, continue to serve for a number of years, often until they reach age 75. (This service beyond initial pension entitlement is frequently undertaken as a supernumerary judge.) There is currently no provision in the Judges Act removing the obligation of these judges to continue to contribute toward the cost of their annuities, at the rate of either 7% or 1½% of salary, notwithstanding that they have reached the age and completed the service required to qualify for a full annuity. These judges receive no additional pension benefit for their continuing contributions, apart from the marginally higher annuities they will eventually receive when they do retire on two-thirds of their indexed salary.

The Commission recommends that judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities, survivors' benefits and the indexing of annuities be eliminated. We do not recommend the reimbursement to judges of the pension contributions heretofore paid.

B. "Rule of Eighty"

The "Rule of Eighty" is a measure that balances age and years of service in determining retirement eligibility. The Judges Act presently adopts the "Rule of Eighty" to a limited extent. A judge who has attained the age of 65 years and has continued in judicial office for at least fifteen years is eligible to retire, or elect supernumerary status. A judge who has attained the age of 70 years and has held office for at least ten years is entitled to elect supernumerary status (but not to retire).

The Guthrie Commission recommended that the "Rule of Eighty" be extended to permit retirement at full pension, but not the election of supernumerary status, at the following combinations of age and years of service on the bench: 60 years of age and 20 years of service; 61 and 19; 62 and 18; 63 and 17; and 64 and 16. The Joint Committee on Judicial Benefits and the Standing Committee of the Canadian Bar Association both suggested that this Committee extend the recommendation of the Guthrie Commission to include the election of supernumerary status.

We do not agree with the recommendation of the Guthrie Commission or with the submissions made to us with respect to the "Rule of Eighty". We accept that the present law was premised on the expectation of the appointment of the more senior members of the bar and does not readily take into account those who accept an appointment to the bench in the early forties or younger. However, we view that expectation to be eminently reasonable and well-founded.

Furthermore, the young lawyer who applies for an appointment to the bench is mindful of the expectation, and the requirement, to serve until age 65 in order to be eligible for an annuity or election of supernumerary status. We feel that 65 years should remain as the age threshold for these benefits, and with the minimum service requirement of fifteen years, together reflect the important premise that a lawyer who accepts judicial appointment does so with the expectation that he or she is accepting a lifetime commitment. In addition, we would be opposed to a judge serving more than ten years on supernumerary status.

We therefore recommend that the combination of 65 years of age and 15 years of service on the bench remain as the eligibility criteria for a judge's annuity or election to serve as a supernumerary judge, and that election of supernumerary status continue to be permitted at 70 years of age following 10 years of service.

C. Annuities Granted to Surviving Spouses

Subsection 44(1) of the Judges Act provides an annuity to the surviving spouse of a judge who dies, equal to one-third of the judge's salary, and subsection 44(2) of the Act provides an annuity to the surviving spouse of a retired judge who was in receipt of an annuity at the time of death, equal to half of the amount of the retired judge's annuity. Both these types of survivor's annuities are indexed pursuant to the provisions of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

We feel, as did the Guthrie Commission, that survivors' benefits under the Judges Act should better reflect current values of survivors' benefits provided by many private pension plans and by federal and provincial pension benefits and standards legislation. We therefore recommend that the surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office be entitled to an annuity equal to 40% (instead of one-third) of the judge's salary at the time of death. We further recommend that the surviving spouse of a retired judge who dies while in receipt of an annuity, be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% (instead of one-half) of the amount of the retired judge's annuity at the time of death. The benefits of eligible children should be adjusted accordingly. These increases in survivors' benefits should apply only with respect to survivors not in receipt of annuities upon the coming into force of the necessary amendments to the Judges Act.

D. Return of Contributions toward Annuities

The Judges Act (at subsections 51(1), (2) and (3)) and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (at section 6) provide for the return of a judge's contributions toward annuities in specified circumstances. Pursuant to subsection 51(4) of the Judges Act, interest is payable upon the return of contributions made under that Act, at the rate of 4% compounded annually.

Like the Guthrie Commission, we believe this rate is unfair and quite often unrealistic. Therefore, we recommend that compound interest be payable upon the return of all contributions at a rate to be varied as and when necessary to reflect the "prescribed rates".[10] If no prescribed rate was in effect, then a rate comparable to the average equivalent yield obtainable during each year on 90-day Government of Canada Treasury Bills should be used.

E. Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada

Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada cannot elect to hold office as supernumerary judges. We appreciate that extending the existing supernumerary scheme to members of the Supreme Court would create very real problems and would undoubtedly prove to be inappropriate. While to do so would make additional judges available to the Court, the finality of its decisions might be undermined to the extent they were made by supernumerary rather than "full" members of the Court. In addition, supernumerary status might upset the collegiality of the nine-member Court.

In view of the immense workload and heavy responsibility which are inherent in membership on the Supreme Court of Canada, a number of options have been advanced over the years which would inject additional flexibility into the retirement provisions of the Judges Act as they apply to members of the Supreme Court. The Guthrie Commission recommended a special provision for Supreme Court judges, given their ineligibility for supernumerary status. That Commission recommended that a Supreme Court judge who reached age 70, with at least ten years on the Court, be entitled to retire at 90% of salary until age 75, at which time the annuity would reduce to the standard two-thirds of salary.

We are not persuaded that the Guthrie Commission recommendation is necessarily the preferred means of dealing with the fact that Supreme Court judges cannot elect supernumerary status; accordingly, we do not recommend it at this time.

[10] See Part XLIII (sections 4300-4301) of the Income Tax Regulations.

F. Guaranteed Annuity Option

The Guthrie Commission recommended that a retiring judge be given the one-time option of receiving an actuarially reduced annuity for a ten-year guaranteed period. The recommendation was designed to mitigate the harshness of the consequences resulting from the death, shortly after commencing retirement, of a former judge. As matters now stand, the retirement annuity to which the deceased retiree would have been entitled would be halved (or reduced by 40% if our recommendation in Item C above is implemented) in the hands of the surviving spouse, with the former judge having received very little of what otherwise would have been payable over the years.

We agree with the Guthrie Commission that it would be desirable to proceed with a guaranteed annuity option for retired judges. We therefore recommend that a retiring judge be given the one-time option of receiving an actuarially reduced annuity for a ten-year guaranteed period. Following the expiry of the ten-year guaranteed period, the surviving spouse's annuity would be reduced to 50% (or 60% pursuant to our recommendation in Item C above) of the amount of the initial (actuarially reduced) annuity. The initial annuity amount would continue for a ten-year period in favour of the surviving spouse, eligible children or the estate, as the case may be. We note that there would be no additional cost for an option of this kind.

G. Indexation of Annuities

Judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, are indexed pursuant to, and in accordance with a complex formula set out in, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. That Act also applies to pensioners from many branches and groups of the public service, as well as to retired Members of Parliament, Lieutenant Governors and Governors General. The Act is administered by the President of the Treasury Board.

The Guthrie Commission recommended that the provisions for indexing judicial annuities should be transferred to the Judges Act from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. We do not agree. We feel that the constitutional requirement for Parliament to fix and provide the "pensions" of judges, in so far as that obligation bears upon the indexation of annuities, is met regardless of whether indexing of judicial annuities is provided for by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act or by the Judges Act. The principle of indexing as it applies to judicial annuities is no more secure, or vulnerable to modification for that matter, in the one Act as in the other. We also note that the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, which examined the report of the Guthrie Commission after its tabling in Parliament in 1987, did not accept the recommendation to transfer the judicial annuity indexing provisions to the Judges Act.

XI. FORMER CHIEF JUSTICES SERVING AS SUPERNUMERARY OR PUISNE JUDGES

The Judges Act provides at subsections 29(4) and 30(4) that a chief justice or chief judge, or an associate chief, who elects supernumerary status is entitled to receive the salary of a puisne judge during his or her supernumerary service. Subsections 31(4) and 32(4) provide that a chief justice or chief judge, or an associate chief, who has served in that position for at least five years and who reverts to the status of a puisne judge is also entitled to receive the salary of a puisne judge following the reversion. It has been suggested to this Commission that a former chief justice or chief judge who has elected to serve as a supernumerary judge or as a puisne judge should continue to receive the salary of a chief justice or chief judge. We do not agree. We feel that the salary should match the office, and the duties, then being performed.

We note that when these former chief justices or chief judges retire, pursuant to subsections 43(1) and (2) their annuities are based on the salaries then in effect of a chief justice or chief judge. This makes eminent sense because, by virtue of their having served as chiefs, they have earned the higher annuities.

XII. TAXATION OF NEW JUDGES

When a lawyer in the private practice of law is appointed to the bench, he or she is likely to be faced with an unusually large income tax burden in the year of appointment. This considerable tax burden results from the combination of professional income earned during the fiscal year prior to the appointment, taxable capital gains and recaptured capital cost allowance on assets deemed disposed of and taxable capital gains on the disposition of the partnership interest. In addition, earnings from the last fiscal year-end to the date of appointment ("stub period earnings"), unbilled work in progress and the 1971 accounts receivable reserve (if any) would also have to be included in taxable income.

It might be noted that lawyers appointed to the bench are, generally speaking, professionals of some standing in the legal community who are at or near the peak of their earning powers. As such, the aforementioned amounts are likely to represent substantial taxable items which must be added to the judicial salary itself. This results in an unusually high taxable income for that individual in the year of appointment and places the great proportion of that taxable income within the highest marginal tax bracket.

The tax situation confronting judges upon appointment used to be even more onerous. Section 24.1 of the Income Tax Act, enacted in 1984 following the Lang Commission report, provides some relief by way of permitting a newly appointed judge to defer the reporting of a portion of his or her income from the final year of practice until the year following the appointment to the bench. In other words, section 24.1 permits the tax burden arising in the year of appointment to the bench to be spread over that and the following taxation year.

Notwithstanding section 24.1, the lawyer considering an appointment may still be hesitant due to an unavoidable and extensive tax indebtedness in the first year or two on the bench if the offer of an appointment is accepted. In our view, an essential element in recruiting the best qualified lawyers to the bench is a comprehensive financial package which not only includes attractive salaries and benefits, but also avoids imposing financial or tax disincentives to accepting judicial appointment. We therefore recommend that discussions between the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance continue with a view to alleviating the tax burden on newly appointed judges.

XIII. CONCLUSION

The Triennial Commission review process was instituted by Parliament to reduce the factor of partisan politics in the determination and adjustment of judicial compensation and to reinforce the principle of judicial independence. Delay in implementing or substantial disregard of the recommendations of a Triennial Commission threatens the integrity of the review process and considerably reduces its effectiveness. For that to happen would be contrary to both the intentions of Parliament and the public interest.

XIV. SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That the Minister of the day promptly inform Parliament, following the tabling of the reports of this and subsequent Triennial Commissions, as to what action the Government proposes to take with regard to their individual recommendations or, if necessary, indicate promptly the Government's disagreement with any of such recommendations (Chapter III).

2. That whenever legislation to implement Triennial Commission recommendations is introduced in Parliament, the Government should proceed to ensure its quick passage (Chapter III).

3. The recommended levels of salary as of April 1, 1989, are as follows (Chapter IV):

   - Judges, Tax Court of Canada, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts— $142,000
   - Chief Justices (Judge) and Associate Chief Justices (Judge), Tax Court of Canada, Federal Court of Canada and Superior Courts— $155,300
   - Judges, Supreme Court of Canada— $168,600
   - Chief Justice of Canada— $182,100

4. That the salaries of judges and chief judges of the county and district courts be increased to the salary levels of judges and chief justices of the superior courts. The result, effective April 1, 1989, should be (Chapter V):

   - Judges, county and district courts— $142,000
   - Chief Judges and Associate Chief Judges, county and district courts— $155,300

5. That the annual representational allowance be increased to $15,000 for the Chief Justice of Canada, to $10,000 for the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada and the Chief Justice of each province, and to $8,000 for each other chief justice, chief judge, senior judge or judge presently entitled to receive it (Chapter VIII).

6. That the Judges Act be amended to authorize the Minister of Justice of Canada to approve the payment of additional amounts as representational allowance in any given year (Chapter VIII).

7. That the annual conference allowance for the Supreme Court of Canada be increased to $1,500 per judge and the annual allowance for all other courts be increased to $750 per judge with a minimum of $7,500 per court (Chapter IX).

8. That judicial contributions toward the cost of annuities, survivors' benefits and the indexing of annuities be eliminated (Chapter X, Item A).

9. That the combination of 65 years of age and 15 years of service on the bench remain as the eligibility criteria for a judge's annuity or election to serve as a supernumerary judge, and that election of supernumerary status continue to be permitted at 70 years of age following 10 years of service (Chapter X, Item B).

10. That the surviving spouse of a judge who dies in office be entitled to an annuity equal to 40% (instead of one-third) of the judge's salary at the time of death (Chapter X, Item C).

11. That the surviving spouse of a retired judge who dies while in receipt of an annuity, be entitled to an annuity equal to 60% (instead of one-half) of the amount of the retired judge's annuity at the time of death (Chapter X, Item C).

12. That compound interest be payable upon the return of all contributions at a rate to be varied as and when necessary to reflect the "prescribed rates" (Chapter X, Item D).

13. That a retiring judge be given the one-time option of receiving an actuarially reduced annuity for a ten-year guaranteed period (Chapter X, Item F).

14. That discussions between the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance continue with a view to alleviating the tax burden on newly appointed judges (Chapter XII).

All of which is respectfully submitted this 5th day of March, 1990.

1989 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

NOTICE

This Commission was appointed on September 30, 1989 by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act to federally-appointed judges and into the adequacy of federally-appointed judges' benefits generally, including the granting of annuities provided to judges and to their surviving spouses and children.

The Commission invites written submissions in either official language concerning the matters within the Commission's terms of reference. Written submissions must reach the Commission by December 31, 1989, in eight copies. A party intending to file a written submission with the Commission may also request an opportunity to make a presentation at an oral hearing. The Commission must be notified by December 31, 1989 of the party's desire to appear at an oral hearing. A party filing a written submission need not request to appear at an oral hearing.

Copies of the Commission's terms of reference are available upon request.

COMMISSION DE 1989 SUR LE TRAITEMENT ET LES AVANTAGES DES JUGES

AVIS

La Commission de 1989 sur le traitement et les avantages des juges a été instituée le 30 septembre 1989 par le ministre de la Justice et procureur général du Canada, en application de l'article 26 de la Loi sur les juges. Elle a pour mandat de déterminer si le traitement et les avantages des juges nommés par le gouvernement fédéral ainsi que les pensions auxquelles ceux-ci, leur conjoint et leurs enfants ont droit, sont satisfaisants.

La Commission invite toute personne intéressée à lui soumettre par écrit ses vues sur les sujets qu'elle a reçu pour mission d'examiner. Ces interventions doivent prendre la forme d'un document écrit, établi dans l'une ou l'autre des deux langues officielles, et être déposées auprès de la Commission en huit exemplaires au plus tard le 31 décembre 1989. Quiconque dépose un tel document écrit peut en outre demander à la Commission d'être entendu par celle-ci. En pareil cas, il convient d'aviser la Commission au plus tard le 31 décembre 1989 du souhait de présenter des observations orales. Il convient de noter que le dépôt de documents écrits n'oblige nullement à présenter les observations orales.

Il est possible d'obtenir le texte définissant le mandat de la Commission sur simple demande.

APPENDIX "C"

Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada

Ministre de la Justice et procureur général du Canada

December 20, 1979.

I am writing to inform you of the decision that the Government had reached on amendments to the Judges Act that were planned to be introduced in Parliament on Monday, December 17th. However, as you know, the dissolution of Parliament prevented this from being done. Nevertheless, I wanted you to be aware of the recommendations that the Government was about to make to Parliament for salary increases for all judges and to improve the overall compensation package provided for them and their dependants.

The Government had agreed on salary increases that would have been in line with those recommended in the Dorfman Report on Judicial Compensation and Other Related Matters, to be effective April 1, 1979 and again on April 1, 1980. It was also decided to rationalize the salary structure by removing the additional salary for "extra-judicial services" in subsection 20(1) of the Act and adding that amount to the basic judicial salary. I think you will agree that this would be a much more straightforward way of recording judicial salaries.

A further decision was to provide for each judge a new accountable allowance of up to $1,000 a year for expenses required for the fit and proper execution of the office of judge. This would be to ensure that the necessary expenditures for robes, books and the like are not borne by judges personally, but would be met out of specific funds provided by Parliament for this purpose. The recommendations made by the Dorfman Committee regarding conference expenses, representational allowances and an increase in the allowance for the judges in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory were also adopted by the Government.

On the matter of a salary review mechanism for judicial salaries, the Government directed a comprehensive study of this issue, with the aim of legislation before April, 1981, to implement an effective method of reviewing judicial salaries, in keeping with the provisions of the BNA

Act and the independence of the judiciary, without having continually to resort to the legislative process.

The Government also directed the Minister of Finance to study the transitional income-tax problems frequently experienced by new appointees to the bench and others who leave self-employment or a profession for salaried office or employment, in order to develop a comprehensive approach to a rational and equitable solution to the problem so clearly outlined in the Dorfman Report.

The final issue of real significance in the Government's decisions related to annuities. The Government wished to ensure that the minimum annuity to be received by the spouse of a deceased judge would not be less than $13,900. This base figure would have been "indexed", and was adopted as being the group average received by all such spouses as of October 1, 1979.

There is finally the matter of contributions towards annuities. The Government decided to seek the abolition of the requirement that some judges contribute towards the cost of their basic annuities, while others contribute only towards annuities for their dependants. The Government's decision was that the abolition of basic contributions would be retroactive to the date of introduction in 1975 and the present system of contributions would be replaced by a uniform contribution, to be paid by all federally-appointed judges, for the "indexed" aspect of annuities, that is, the Supplementary Retirement Benefit. That contribution would be at the standard rate, now 1%, although it is expected that an increase in the contribution would be required before too long. The result of this decision would have been a refund of the excess contributions paid heretofore, with interest.

It is my view that this proposed overall package of improvements in judicial compensation would be most adequate, having regard to the need for financial restraint, and I am truly sorry that we have been unable to secure its enactment at this time.

Yours sincerely,

Jacques Flynn

Le 20 décembre 1979

Monsieur le juge,

La présente a pour but de vous faire part des décisions prises par le gouvernement ayant trait aux amendements à la Loi sur les juges qui devaient être introduits au Parlement, lundi le 17 décembre. Toutefois, comme vous le savez, la dissolution du Parlement a empêché ceci d'être fait. Néanmoins, je voulais que vous preniez connaissance des recommandations que le gouvernement était sur le point de faire au Parlement pour augmenter le traitement de tous les juges et améliorer les avantages prévus pour eux et les personnes à leur charge.

Le gouvernement avait approuvé des augmentations de traitement qui auraient été conformes aux recommandations du Rapport Dorfman sur la rémunération des juges et autres questions connexes. Celles-ci seraient entrées en vigueur en deux étapes, soit le 1er avril 1979 et le 1er avril 1980. Il avait aussi été décidé de rationaliser la structure du traitement des juges en retranchant le traitement supplémentaire pour «services extrajudiciaires» visé au paragraphe 20(1) de la Loi sur les juges et en ajoutant ce montant au traitement de base. Je crois que vous conviendrez que ceci serait une façon plus juste de comptabiliser le traitement des juges.

En plus, la décision avait été prise d'accorder à chaque juge une nouvelle indemnité annuelle d'au plus 1 000 $, dont il serait tenu de rendre compte, en contrepartie des frais accessoires à la bonne exécution de ses fonctions. Cette mesure aurait visé à assurer que les juges n'auraient pas à payer eux-mêmes certaines dépenses entraînées par leur charge, comme par exemple l'achat de toges et de livres, ces dépenses devant être acquittées à même les fonds fournis par le Parlement. Les recommandations du Comité Dorfman sur les frais de représentation, les frais de déplacement pour assister à des conférences et l'indemnité de vie chère pour les juges des Territoires du Nord-Ouest et du Territoire du Yukon avaient aussi été adoptées par le gouvernement.

Le gouvernement a demandé qu'une étude en profondeur soit faite sur la possibilité de mettre en place un mécanisme de révision du traitement des juges en vue d'une législation qui serait prête avant avril 1981. Notre but était de mettre au point une loi efficace portant sur la révision du traitement des juges, qui aurait été conforme aux dispositions de l'A.A.N.B. et au principe de l'indépendance de la magistrature, sans avoir à faire continuellement appel au processus législatif.

Le gouvernement avait en outre donné instruction au ministre des Finances d'étudier les problèmes d'ordre fiscal auxquels font souvent face les nouveaux juges aussi bien que les personnes quittant la pratique privée ou leur profession pour accepter une charge ou un emploi rémunéré. Cette étude aurait permis d'apporter au problème si clairement exposé dans le rapport Dorfman une solution rationnelle et équitable.

La dernière question importante qui fut l'objet des décisions du gouvernement fut celle qui a trait à la pension. Le gouvernement tenait à s'assurer que la pension minimale versée au conjoint d'un juge décédé ne serait pas inférieure à 13 900 $. Ce chiffre de base aurait été «indexé». Ce montant fut adopté comme étant la moyenne des pensions reçues par les veuves, en date du 1er octobre 1979.

Pour terminer, j'en viens à la question des contributions des juges à leur pension. Le gouvernement avait décidé d'abroger la disposition portant que certains juges doivent participer à leur pension de base alors que d'autres ne contribuent qu'à la pension payable aux personnes dont ils ont la charge. Ainsi, il avait été décidé que l'abolition des contributions de base serait rétroactive à la date de leur entrée en vigueur en 1975, et que le présent système de participation serait remplacé par une contribution uniforme qu'auraient versé tous les juges nommés par le gouvernement fédéral relativement à l'«indexation» de leur pension, c'est-à-dire en ce qui concerne la prestation de retraite supplémentaire. Cette contribution aurait été au même taux de un pour cent qui est présentement versé par les autres personnes quoiqu'une augmentation du tarif de contribution est à prévoir.

En conséquence, les juges auraient reçu un remboursement des cotisations qu'ils ont versées en trop jusqu'à maintenant, avec intérêt.

J'estime que dans l'ensemble ces améliorations proposées pour la rémunération des juges auraient été très satisfaisantes, compte tenu des restrictions budgétaires auxquelles nous sommes tous soumis. Je suis navré que nous n'ayions pu obtenir l'adoption des ces propositions en ce moment.

Veuillez agréer l'expression de mes sentiments les meilleurs,

Jacques Flynn

Terms of Reference

The 1992 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits was appointed on September 30, 1992, by the Honourable Kim Campbell, then Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act, and was given the following terms of reference:

> "The Commission shall, pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally.
> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the Commission shall inquire into and report on the following matters:
> 1. the adequacy of judges' salaries, allowances and benefits, taking into account the principle of judicial independence, comparative factors, the general Canadian economic situation and the ability to attract qualified candidates for judicial office;
> 2. how judicial annuities can be harmonized with the Income Tax Act with respect to the establishment of a registered pension plan and retirement compensation arrangement;

3. how judicial annuities can be harmonized with federal pension benefit standards;

4. how the current provisions respecting supernumerary judges might be modified to better ensure achievement of the benefits that supernumerary judges can provide;

5. the adequacy of existing provisions in the Judges Act regarding resignation on the basis of permanent infirmity; and

6. the projected costs of the Commission's recommendations.

The Commission shall report to the Minister of Justice by March 31, 1993."

Meetings and Conference Calls

The Commission held meetings and/or telephone conference calls as follows:

October 25, 1992 - Toronto

Counsel Appearing: The Honourable Paule Gauthier, P.C., O.C., Q.C., Québec City
(President of the Association)
Donald R. Cranston, Edmonton
(Chairman of the Standing Committee)

Previous Committees and Commissions

The 1992 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits is the seventh federal committee or commission established in recent years to inquire into and make recommendations to the Minister of Justice with respect to judicial salaries, allowances and benefits. It is the fourth Triennial Commission appointed pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act.

In September 1974, a Special Advisory Committee, chaired by the Honourable Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, a retired member of the Supreme Court of Canada, reported to the Minister. The Dorfman Committee on Judicial Compensation and Related Matters was chaired by Irwin Dorfman, Q.C., and reported to the Minister in November 1978. The de Grandpré Committee on Judicial Annuities, chaired by Jean de Grandpré, Q.C., reported in December 1981. The 1983 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the first of the Triennial Commissions established pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act, was chaired by the Honourable Otto Lang, P.C., Q.C., and it reported to the Minister in October 1983. The 1986 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the second Triennial Commission, was chaired by H. Donald Guthrie, Q.C., and reported to the Minister in February 1987. The 1989 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, which was the third Triennial Commission, was chaired by E. Jacques Courtois, Q.C., and reported to the Minister in March 1990.

Acknowledgements

The Commission wishes to thank Pierre Garceau, Q.C., Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs (Ottawa), and the members of his staff, in particular Ginette Beauparlant and Wayne Osborne, for their support throughout the Commission's mandate.

We also thank Bernard Dussault, F.S.A., F.C.I.A., Acting Chief Actuary; Claude Gagné, F.S.A., F.C.I.A., Director, Government Services Division; and L.M. Cornelis, F.S.A., F.C.I.A., Chief, Government Services Division, all of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions (Ottawa), as well as Marc-André Paradis, F.S.A., F.C.I.A., and Luc St.-Pierre, M.Sc.I.R., both of Sobeco Ernst & Young (Montreal), for their valuable actuarial and costing assistance.

The Commission was extremely fortunate to have had Harold Sandell of the Department of Justice in Ottawa assigned to it as Executive Secretary. Mr. Sandell's enthusiastic and dedicated service, together with his comprehensive knowledge of the Canadian legal and judicial systems, made it possible for us to complete our report within the legislated time limit. We are indeed grateful to Mr. Sandell for his able assistance.

II. INTRODUCTION

The Triennial Commission is a contributor to a process by which the remuneration of federally appointed judges is determined and implemented. The role of the Triennial Commission in that process is to examine the state of judicial salaries, pensions, allowances and benefits and then make recommendations to the Minister of Justice of Canada regarding the need or the desirability of changes in the judicial remuneration package. In order for the Commission's recommendations or any other changes in judicial remuneration to come into effect, Parliament must enact the necessary legislative amendments, usually to the Judges Act. Once this is done, the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs can then administer the new benefits to the judges, retired judges and survivors entitled to them.

This complex process is designed to preclude arbitrary interference by the executive branch of government in the determination and granting of the judicial compensation package, thereby upholding the principle and strengthening the practical manifestations of judicial independence.

It is perhaps advisable for the Commission to state at the outset that it views its task as one of major importance. We have enormous respect for the judiciary and for the fundamental role which it plays in the functioning of our society. Canadians have been well served by our judges. We are pleased to make this contribution in support of such a worthy institution.

III. THE REVIEW PROCESS

The Judges Act, at section 26, imposes strict time limits on the Triennial Commission process. The Minister of Justice is required to appoint from three to five commissioners every third year "to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under [the Judges Act] and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally". The commissioners are required within six months of their appointment to submit a report to the Minister of Justice "containing such recommendations as they consider appropriate", and the Minister must "cause the report to be laid before Parliament" within ten Parliamentary sitting days after he or she receives it.

Parliament had a clear purpose in legislating these obligatory time limits into every stage of the Triennial Commission process. Parliament recognized that the integrity of this full and independent review of judicial compensation matters would be seriously compromised without also compelling both the commissioners and the Minister to treat the review with the utmost resolve.

It stands to reason, therefore, that the Government of the day and Parliament must treat the Triennial Commission's report with similar deference. The exigencies of an independent judiciary, which is fundamental to our democratic society, demand nothing less. Long delays in the introduction of legislation in response to recommendations of the Commission and further long delays in the enactment of any such legislation — as have occurred in the past — can be very discouraging to the judiciary, and over time can negatively impact on the judges' independence, particularly if they have to become advocates for their own cause.

The respect shown for the concept of judicial independence in the design of the Triennial Commission process has been tainted by the business-as-usual attitude of successive Governments once the Commission reports have been presented to Ministers of Justice and tabled in Parliament. This failure to act with reasonable promptness cannot but lead to the entire review process losing credibility. This Commission notes, for example, that the legislation (Bill C-50) comprising the Government's response to the 1989 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits (the Courtois Commission), was not introduced in Parliament until December 1991, and that by the end of the mandate of the current Commission, this relatively uncomplicated legislation had not yet been enacted.

We therefore recommend that the Government of the day state its response to the recommendations of a Triennial Commission, and introduce its resultant legislation, as soon as feasible but in any event within 20 sitting days after the expiry of a nine-month period immediately following the submission of the Triennial Commission report to the Minister of Justice.

The Commission believes that it is neither desirable nor (in view of the requirement of section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867) constitutional, for Triennial Commission recommendations to be binding on the Government. However, the process of independent review mandated by Parliament over a decade ago loses much of its effectiveness, and might even be rendered meaningless, if the Government's, or Parliament's, response to a Commission's recommendations is allowed to become part of the political agenda or the subject of partisan debate.

We believe that Triennial Commission members should be prepared to become advocates for their recommendations. To this end, we recommend that Triennial Commission members be called as witnesses by parliamentary standing and legislative committees to elaborate on and support their recommendations, both in proceedings where their report is being considered and in proceedings which are considering the Government's legislative response to the recommendations.

IV. THE COMMISSION'S HEARING PROCESS

Triennial Commission members, during the period of their mandate, should have access to the best information available concerning matters of relevance to the Commission's terms of reference. This Commission has benefited from having received very helpful documentation and background material provided by a number of federal government departments. This information was also provided to all the judicial organizations that made presentations at the oral hearing.

We feel that receiving information of this nature would prove equally useful to future Triennial Commissions as well as to the judges' organizations. We therefore recommend that this briefing process, including the possibility of Department of Justice and other federal government officials appearing at Commission hearings to present departmental positions on relevant issues, be encouraged and even formalized. We also recommend that the practice of holding open hearings be continued by future Triennial Commissions.

V. JUDICIAL SALARIES

Recognition of financial security as a fundamental component of the independence of the judiciary dates back almost three centuries, to the Act of Settlement of 1701. The Constitution Act, 1867, at section 100, acknowledges the essentiality of judges' financial security by conferring on Parliament the duty to fix and provide judicial salaries, allowances and pensions. Other legislated manifestations of the importance of financial security within the context of judicial independence are the Triennial Commission review process, the annual salary adjustment (section 25 of the Judges Act) and the administration of Part I of the Judges Act by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, instead of by the Deputy Minister of Justice, who in his or her capacity of Deputy Attorney General of Canada is a frequent litigator before the judges. The Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs reports directly to the Minister of Justice.

The Supreme Court of Canada has twice underscored the necessity and importance of financial security within the context of judicial independence (The Queen v. Beauregard, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, at 74- 75; Valente v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, at 704). The Supreme Court understood financial security to include both the determinative source of judicial compensation — that is to say, the legislative authority for payment of judges' remuneration — and the level of compensation. The Court did not suggest at what level of salary financial security is achieved, but it is evident that the Court considered financial security to include a salary level that was not merely adequate, but commensurate with the status, dignity and responsibility of judicial office (Beauregard, p. 75). In addition to these criteria, one must consider the necessity, unique to the requirements of the bench, to attract recruits from among the best qualified and experienced individuals in the generally well-paid legal profession. Furthermore, the judicial salary must be sufficient to preserve and reflect the role and esteem which the office of judge deserves. The judge and his or her family must not only be, but be regarded by society to be financially secure, particularly in view of the statutory requirement (at section 55 and subsection 57(1) of the Judges Act) that a judge devote himself or herself exclusively to judicial duties and not engage in any occupation or business.

The 1983 (Lang), 1986 (Guthrie) and 1989 (Courtois) Triennial Commissions all recommended that the salary level established by amendments to the Judges Act in 1975 be restored in relative terms by increasing salaries in accordance with the "Industrial Composite [now Industrial Aggregate] Index formula", as per section 25 of the Act, for each year since 1975 to allow for inflation, with a cap of 6% and 5% in 1983 and 1984 respectively, to reflect the limit on salary adjustments for members of the public sector under the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act (S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 122). The resultant salary level is commonly referred to as "1975 equivalence."

We are of the view that the concept of "1975 equivalence" is not particularly helpful as a determinant of judges' salaries today. The concept of "1975 equivalence" was developed under circumstances that existed 18 years ago in conjunction with the introduction of mandatory pension contributions and prior to the introduction of automatic annual indexing of judicial salaries. Much has changed since 1975, not the least of which has been the Canadian economy. The concept of "1975 equivalence" no longer relates to empirical realities, and is in serious danger of acquiring the status of arbitrariness.

We believe that an appropriate benchmark by which to gauge judicial salaries is rough equivalence with the mid-point of the salary range of the most senior level of federal public servant, the Deputy Minister 3, commonly referred to as DM-3. As the two immediately previous Triennial Commissions have also indicated, the DM-3 range and mid-point reflect what the marketplace expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by deputy ministers and judges.

There are presently only 20 DM-3s in the entire federal public service, and they hold positions which generally carry very onerous operational, policy, management and budgetary responsibilities. They are a group whose services are immensely valuable to the country as a whole, and to the extent that the value of their services might be quantified with accuracy on any objective scale, it would appear that the same scale could quite fairly apply to superior court judges as well. We say this without any intention of comparing or equating judges to public servants for any purpose whatsoever except the stated purpose of determining an appropriate salary benchmark for judges that would reflect the role and esteem which judicial office deserves and, most important, ensure financial security and thereby contribute to judicial independence. Rough parity of this nature between judges and top-level public servants finds support in the comparative salary figures from a number of other common law industrial democracies.

Disregarding other elements of total compensation, we note that superior court judges' salaries have been below the mid-point of the DM-3 salary range for all but 2 of the 18 years since 1975. Those judicial salaries ($155,800) are currently $500 above the DM-3 mid-point ($155,300), which is well within the scope of rough equivalence. Having determined what we feel is currently an appropriate benchmark for judicial salaries, subsequent Triennial Commissions might re-examine the judges/DM-3 relationship in light of the future salary levels of both groups, without prejudicing the judges' entitlement to receive, in intervening years, annual salary adjustments, to a maximum of 7%, calculated in accordance with section 25 of the Judges Act.

When the salary freeze announced by the Minister of Finance on December 2, 1992, ends on March 31, 1995 (which assumes clause 10 of Bill C-113, the freeze legislation, will be enacted as tabled), the Commission sees no reason for judicial salaries to "bounce back" to where they would have been without the freeze unless the same salary "catch-up" is given to the DM-3s.

We therefore recommend that rough equivalence with the mid-point of the DM-3 salary range be the appropriate benchmark by which to gauge puisne judges' salaries.

We have examined judges' salaries in conjunction with the many other elements of the entire judicial compensation package, and although we are recommending that rough equivalence with DM-3s serve as the benchmark only for judges' salaries, we note that judges' pensions, allowances and other benefits, when considered in the aggregate, are certainly no less generous than those of the DM-3s.

We have also examined the salaries of chief justices and of judges on the Supreme Court of Canada, and their relationship to the salaries of puisne judges. We do not favour fixed dollar differentials between the salaries of the puisne judges and these other groups of judges who are paid at a higher rate, but instead we are of the view that all judges should receive the same percentage increase whenever salaries are raised.

VI. CONTINUING THE SALARIES OF RETIRED JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Bill C-50, introduced on December 12, 1991, is the Government's response to the 1989 (Courtois) Triennial Commission. The Bill, which at the time of the submission of this report to the Minister of Justice had not gone beyond First Reading in the House of Commons, contains a provision which would entitle a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada to receive the incidental and representational allowances during the six-month period immediately following retirement while completing his or her judgments. The Commission fully endorses Bill C-50, including the above-mentioned provision.

However, we do not recommend acceptance of the proposal that a retired judge of the Supreme Court of Canada receive his or her salary during the six-month judgment-writing period immediately following retirement. Supreme Court judges in that position should receive whatever support facilities and staff are necessary to assist them in their judgment-writing, as well as the incidental and representational allowances which Bill C-50 would provide.

The significance of membership on the Supreme Court of Canada is recognized by the higher salary, and consequently the higher annuity, received by its judges. Furthermore, our recommendation, in Item F of Chapter X, for a 65/10 retirement option for the judges of the Supreme Court, recognizes the added responsibilities and workload inherent to the position. It seems to us that these responsibilities would normally include completing and/or contributing to the decisions in matters in which the judge sat in appeal.

VII. ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE SALARY FREEZE ON DECEMBER 2, 1992

On December 2, 1992, the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, delivered an economic and fiscal statement in the House of Commons which, among other things, announced the Government's intention to impose a two-year freeze on judicial salaries. The salary freeze also applied to the Governor General, the Lieutenant Governors, the Prime Minister, Ministers, Members of Parliament, Senators, public servants and the employees of non-commercial Crown corporations. Assuming the freeze legislation as it applies to judges (clause 10 of Bill C-113, introduced on February 17, 1993) is enacted as tabled, it would override the annual salary adjustment provision, section 25 of the Judges Act, in 1993 and 1994.

The Commission has no comments to make with respect to the appropriateness of the two-year salary freeze itself, since to do so would not be within our mandate. However, we believe that the manner in which the Government announced the imposition of the freeze on judges could have been more consistent with the procedures provided for in the Judges Act for maintaining the independence of the judiciary.

This Commission had been appointed and was in the midst of its six-month mandate at the time of the announcement of the freeze. Furthermore, the next statutory salary adjustment following the announcement would not have been payable until April 1, 1993. That being the case, the Government had the option of supporting the process for maintaining judicial independence by presenting its proposal to freeze judges' salaries to the Commission for consideration and comment instead of presenting the judges, and this Commission, with a fait accompli.

VIII. REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLAN CONTRIBUTION LIMITS

Since 1978, pension contributions made under the Judges Act have not been treated as reducing the amount which judges may contribute to a Registered Retirement Savings Plan (R.R.S.P.). Up to and including the 1991 taxation year, judges have been permitted to deduct from income for tax purposes not only their statutory pension contributions but also contributions toward an R.R.S.P. up to the self-employed limit ($11,500 for 1991).

As a result of the coming-into-force in 1990 of the amendments to the Income Tax Act contained in Bill C-52 (S.C. 1990, c. 35), and in 1991 of the new section 8309 of the Income Tax Regulations, as of the 1992 taxation year judges lost the benefit of the higher deduction which had been available to them since 1978. Judges will now have the same tax-deductible R.R.S.P. contribution room, $1,000, that is available to taxpayers who are members of a Registered Pension Plan providing the maximum permissible benefits. We note that a number of other taxpayers in similar situations have also had their tax-deductible R.R.S.P. contribution room reduced to $1,000.

The Commission is of the view that as a matter of general tax policy, all taxpayers should be placed on the same footing. Consequently, the unique and distinct status of judges should not extend to their standing as taxpayers, and their loss of the higher deduction for the 1992 and subsequent taxation years should be allowed to stand. We cannot say it better than Chief Justice Dickson did in Beauregard, at page 76:

> Canadian judges are Canadian citizens and must bear their fair share of the financial burden of administering the country.

Chief Justice Dickson recognized that Parliament can construct new, and change established, judicial remuneration schemes and provisions, but at page 77 he qualified Parliament's power in this way:

> I want to qualify what I have just said. The power of Parliament to fix the salaries and pensions of superior court judges is not unlimited. If there were any hint that a federal law dealing with these matters was enacted for an improper or colourable purpose, or if there was discriminatory treatment of judges vis-a-vis other citizens, then serious issues relating to judicial independence would arise and the law might well be held to be ultra vires s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

There is absolutely no reason to suggest that subjecting judges to the same R.R.S.P. contribution room and tax deduction rules as other taxpayers constitutes discriminatory treatment. The Commission finds no reason to make an exception for judges by continuing the higher deduction anomaly. Nor do we feel that judicial salaries should be adjusted to compensate judges for the changes in the deductibility rules.

We recommend that no exception be made for judges with respect to the changes in the R.R.S.P. deductibility rules implemented by the amendments to the Income Tax Act contained in S.C. 1990, c. 35 and the regulations thereunder.

IX. FORMER CHIEF JUSTICES SERVING AS SUPERNUMERARY OR PUISNE JUDGES

The Judges Act, at subsections 29(4) and 30(4), provides that a chief justice or chief judge, or an associate chief justice or associate chief judge, who elects supernumerary status receives the salary of a puisne judge during his or her supernumerary service. Pursuant to subsections 31(4) and 32(4), a chief justice who reverts to puisne status after serving as a chief justice then receives the salary of a puisne judge following the reversion.

During the public hearings, the Commission was asked to examine the feasibility of amending the Judges Act so that a former chief justice who has elected to serve as a supernumerary judge or has reverted to puisne status can continue to receive the salary of a chief justice.

In our view, the additional responsibilities which attach to the office of a chief justice justify the entitlement to the higher salary level. Should a chief justice relinquish that office by electing to serve as a supernumerary judge or by reverting to puisne judge status, we do not see why his or her salary should continue at the higher level. We therefore concur with the conclusion reached on this point by the 1989 (Courtois) Commission. We also concur with that Commission to the effect that former chief justices or chief judges who retire are justified in receiving, pursuant to subsections 43(1) and (2) of the Judges Act, pensions that are based on the salaries then in effect of a chief justice or chief judge, since they have earned the higher pensions by virtue of their having served as chief justices for at least 5 years.

X. JUDICIAL ANNUITIES

Section 42 of the Judges Act provides for the granting of an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office of a judge at the time of his or her resignation, removal or ceasing to hold office, to a judge who

(a) has continued in office for 15 years and has attained the age of 65, if he or she resigns his or her office:

(b) has continued in office for 15 years but has not attained the age of 65, if his or her resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest;

(c) resigns or is removed as a result of becoming afflicted with a permanent disability preventing him or her from executing his or her office; or

(d) has reached the mandatory retirement age of 75, if he or she has held office for at least 10 years.

If a judge reaches the mandatory retirement age without having served for 10 years, he or she is entitled to an annuity pro-rated on the basis of years of completed service (to the nearest one-tenth of a year) as a proportion of 10 years.

Like the 1986 (Guthrie) Triennial Commission, we are using the terms "annuity" and "pension" interchangeably, since as they apply to judges' benefits they mean essentially the same thing. We note that the Judges Act uses the term "annuity", while section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 refers to "Pensions". We might also point out that in the French version of both the Judges Act and the Constitution, the single term "pension" is used exclusively, even though the French word "annuité" exists and means virtually the same as the English word "annuity". We also refer to the very à propos comment by Chief Justice Dickson in the footnote on page 62 of the Beauregard decision:

> In this judgment I have used the word "pension" because I think it corresponds more closely to the ordinary understanding of the benefits being considered.

A. Judges' Contributions toward Annuities

Prior to 1975, federally appointed judges did not contribute toward the cost of their statutory annuities. The 1975 amendments to the Judges Act (now section 50) require judges who were appointed before February 17, 1975 (the date of First Reading of the amendments), to contribute at a rate of 1.5% of their annual salary to help defray the cost of improved annuities for their surviving spouses and eligible children. These judges are not required to contribute in respect of their own annuities or for indexing the pensions to the cost of living. Judges appointed on or after February 17, 1975, must contribute at a rate of 6% of annual salary toward the cost of their own annuities as well as those of their surviving spouses and children. They also contribute a further 1% of salary to help pay for indexing the pensions to the cost of living. Pension indexing is provided for by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. S-24).

The constitutional authority of Parliament to legislate reasonable contributions by judges toward their annuities, as well as the legality of the differential in contribution rates which is based on date of appointment to the bench, were settled by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Beauregard decision.

The Commission recognizes that annuities represent an important element in the overall judicial compensation scheme. Judicial compensation, as the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed in the Valente and Beauregard decisions, in turn constitutes an essential component in guaranteeing judicial independence. We are firmly of the view, however, and are supported in this contention by the Beauregard decision, that reasonable pension contributions do not affect judicial independence.

The "two classes of judges," each contributing at different rates, which resulted from the "grandfathering" of judges appointed before February 17, 1975, is inexorably losing practical significance with each passing year. We note in this regard that at the time of the writing of this report, only 155 judges, or less than 17% of all judges, are paying 1.5% of salary as pension contributions. Of those paying 1.5%, 95 judges, more than 61%, are supernumerary. That leaves 60 judges, less than 7% of all judges, who are full-time and paying pension contributions at the rate of 1.5%. In terms of the overall membership of the bench, therefore, the proportion paying contributions at the rate of 7% is overwhelming and growing, and those judges accepted appointment with the knowledge that pension contributions of that amount were mandatory.

We support the continuation of judges' contributions toward the cost of their pensions, including supernumerary judges and judges who are entitled to retire but who have not done so. In this connection, we note that even at the current rates of contribution, the judges are actually paying for about one-fifth of the overall cost of their pensions. About 80% of the cost is borne by Canadian taxpayers. (See Appendix D.)

B. Reporting and Accounting

At present, judges' contributions toward the costs of their pensions are paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. To better serve fiscal accountability, we recommend that contributions, benefits, interest and liabilities for the judges' pension scheme be accounted for distinctly in the Pension Accounts, as is already done, for example, for the public service superannuation plan.

C. Indexation of Annuities

Judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, are indexed pursuant to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. That Act applies to the pension plans of virtually all of the branches of the public service and to Members of Parliament, as well as to judges, and it is administered by the President of the Treasury Board.

The unique status of the judiciary, the principle of judicial independence, and the fact that the judicial compensation package (of which pension indexing is a part) is an essential element in the financial security of the judges, all suggest that the indexation of judicial annuities should be provided for in the Judges Act. The indexation of annuities is, for judges alone, a factor that should be regarded as coming within the constitutional guarantee of security of salary and pension. Consequently, we believe that the indexation of judges' pensions should be distinct from the indexation of public service pensions. We note that the provisions regarding the indexation of judges' salaries are already in the Judges Act. This is consistent with our view that all of the elements of the judges' remuneration package should be governed by the Minister of Justice and administered by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs pursuant to provisions contained in the Judges Act.

We therefore recommend that the provisions for indexing judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, should be transferred to the Judges Act from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

D. "Rule of Eighty"

Traditionally, appointments to the superior courts (and when they existed, the county and district courts as well) were made from among the more senior members of the bar, that is, in the age range of 50 years and older. Commencing about a generation ago, a practice began of appointing on occasion younger men and women to the bench: for example, lawyers in their late 30s and early 40s.

This trend, almost imperceptible when it began but now evident, was welcomed. It produced a group of younger judges who are able to dedicate longer periods of service to the judiciary and help meet the increasing demands of the busy court systems. The practice of appointing male and female judges at a younger age has undoubtedly been a successful one, but over the years it has affected the overall age profile of the judges. (Appendix C contains an outline of the average ages of male and female judges appointed to the bench during the years 1981 to 1992 inclusive.)

In view of this changing judicial age profile, we believe that the administration of justice would be better served by providing more flexible rules of retirement. Therefore, the Commission is of the view that 60 years should be the minimum age at which a judge qualifies for a full pension of two-thirds of salary. We are also of the view that 15 years' service on the bench should continue as the minimum required to be eligible for a full pension unless the provisions of subsection 42(2) of the Judges Act, regarding mandatory retirement, apply.

We therefore recommend that retirement at full pension be permitted when a judge has reached at least 60 years of age and has served on the bench for a minimum of 15 years, provided the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80.

The Commission considers a "Rule of 80" retirement option as particularly appropriate in view of the changing age profile of judges. By permitting retirement with a full pension at earlier ages, in a flexible and fair manner which recognizes the unique service conditions and requirements of the judiciary, the Rule of 80 would not be inconsistent with pension reform standards. We note, however, that certain pension reform standards are not relevant, due to the special characteristics of the judges' plan.

E. Disability

The Judges Act, at paragraph 42(1)(c), provides for the granting of a full pension of two-thirds of salary to a judge who resigns or is removed from the bench as a result of becoming afflicted with a permanent disability preventing him or her from executing his or her office.

The Commission has considered whether it is appropriate that a judge can resign pursuant to this provision after very short service and receive a full pension. This led the Commission to consider a number of options, such as the implementation of a pro-rated disability pension in circumstances where a full pension may appear to be overly generous.

The disability provision serves as the judges' long-term disability insurance plan.[1] Since 1982, an average of 3.5 judges per year have retired from the bench, and received a full pension, under the authority of paragraph 42(1)(c). We do not consider this number of disability retirements and the resulting additional years of pension payments to be unusual, given the age profile of judges. In other words, the statistics do not indicate significant problems with the disability provision. We note, in passing, that there are administrative measures that can be taken to resolve any problems that may be identified from time to time.

We consider the paragraph 42(1)(c) disability provision, with its certainty of financial security for the judge and his or her family in the event of the judge's permanent disability, to be an important aspect of his or her overall independence. We do not recommend that any changes be made to the disability provision at paragraph 42(1)(c) of the Act.

F. Retirement for Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada

It is universally recognized that acceptance of an appointment as a Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada brings with it an immense workload and heavy responsibility. In addition, judges of the Supreme Court cannot elect to hold office as supernumerary judges. Like the earlier Triennial Commissions, we appreciate that supernumerary status is inappropriate for the judges of our highest court, and inconsistent with the Court's unique role as the final arbiter of the country's legal values. The finality of the Supreme Court's decisions requires that they be handed down only by full-time members of the Court rather than by supernumerary judges. Furthermore, supernumerary status might impair the collegiality of the nine-member Court, and detract from the sense of permanence and the regional balance which add to its credibility and legitimacy.

In view of the unusually heavy burden inherent in membership on the Supreme Court of Canada, and the unavailability of supernumerary service, the Commission is of the view that an additional retirement option should be provided exclusively to the judges of that court. Therefore, in addition to the existing retirement entitlements and the recommended new Rule of 80 retirement option in Item D above, we recommend that judges be permitted to retire with a full pension after serving for a minimum of 10 years on the Supreme Court of Canada and reaching the age of 65 years.

[1] Short-term illness requiring absence from judicial duties for a period in excess of 30 days can be accommodated by the judge obtaining a leave of absence from the Governor in Council under subsection 54(1) of the Judges Act. An average of 8 illness-related leaves of absence per year have been granted in each of the last six years under subsection 54(1). In any event, whenever a judge will be absent from his or her judicial duties for more than 30 days, the judge must report the absence and the reasons therefor to the Minister pursuant to subsection 54(3).

G. Credit Splitting on Marriage Breakdown

When the recently enacted Pension Benefits Division Act (S.C. 1992, c. 46) is brought into force, it will provide a scheme applicable to certain statutory pension plans which recognizes the right of a spouse to a share of the plan member's pension credits on the breakdown of a marriage or common-law relationship. The Act will enable the divorced or separated spouse of a plan member to apply for a division of the member's pension credits which have accrued during the period of cohabitation, as long as there is a court order or a spousal agreement which provides for the division of the credits. The Pension Benefits Division Act will apply to the pension plans of the federal public service, the Canadian Forces, the R.C.M.P., Members of Parliament, lieutenant governors, the Governor General and others. It will not apply to judges' pensions under the Judges Act. Consequently, there is currently no authority to split a judge's pension credits upon the breakdown of his or her marriage.

Credit splitting is another area of pension reform where harmonization of judicial pensions is a worthwhile objective. It is an accepted pension reform standard under both federal and provincial legislation. We believe as a matter of fairness and equity that credit splitting ought to be made applicable to the judiciary. Therefore, we recommend that the Judges Act be amended to incorporate therein the relevant provisions of the Pension Benefits Division Act, with such changes as the circumstances require. The regulations made thereunder to permit the valuation of judicial pensions for credit splitting purposes should be made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice after consultation with the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

It is important that the Judges Act actually contain the relevant provisions of the Pension Benefits Division Act, rather than merely being listed as one more statute to which the Pension Benefits Division Act applies, since as a compensation matter it impacts on the independence of the judiciary and, as we stated earlier with respect to the indexation of judges' pensions, it should be governed by the Minister of Justice and administered by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

This amendment would permit the payment of part of a judge's pension credits to his or her non-judge spouse or on the spouse's behalf. This transfer would be made directly out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and would have the effect of reducing the amount of the pension that the judge would eventually receive. We are informed that a judge's pension credits may be actuarially valuated and quantified for these purposes at any time following appointment, notwithstanding that judges' pensions are the non-accrual type. (We note that the lieutenant governors', Governor General's and non-career diplomats' pensions are also the non-accrual type.) We do not regard the concept of credit splitting as interfering with the principle of judicial independence.

XI. SUPERNUMERARY STATUS

Rather than leave the bench after attaining the minimum qualification for retirement, a judge has the option pursuant to sections 28 and 29 of the Judges Act to elect to serve as a supernumerary judge. Under this arrangement, a puisne judge who is at least 65 years of age and has served as a federally appointed judge for a minimum of 15 years, or has reached the age of 70 years and has held office for at least 10 years, may opt to continue in office until age 75 as a supernumerary judge by so electing. A supernumerary judge holds himself or herself available to perform whatever judicial duties his or her chief justice requests of him or her.

A supernumerary judge remains entitled to a full judicial salary until the judge reaches mandatory retirement age or otherwise leaves the bench, at which time he or she would receive a full annuity. A chief justice or associate chief justice who elects supernumerary status is entitled to receive the salary of a puisne judge during his or her supernumerary service, although the subsequent annuity is based on the salary then in effect of a chief justice.

All federally appointed judges except the members of the Supreme Court of Canada are entitled to opt for supernumerary status. Approximately 18% of the federally appointed bench are currently supernumerary judges, and that proportion is anticipated to increase in the years ahead.

When a judge becomes a supernumerary judge, the judicial position held by that judge becomes vacant and a replacement might then be appointed (although not necessarily so). Consequently, the supernumerary programme lengthens judicial careers and promotes continuity on the bench, while making available positions which could not otherwise be filled until the retirement of the incumbents. Supernumerary status allows a judge who might not be able to carry a full workload, but who is otherwise able to work on a part-time basis, to continue to do so for the benefit of his or her court.

The judges, in their submissions, informed us that the workload of a supernumerary judge is expected to average, on a cross-Canada basis, 50% of the workload of a regular, full-time judge. On that basis, combined with the fact that the large majority of supernumerary judges are entitled to retire with a full pension by virtue of having reached the 65/15 age and service thresholds, we accept the judges' representations that from an economic standpoint, a supernumerary judge represents an efficient use of human resources, and that supernumerary service is quite conducive to the effective administration of the courts, including the reduction of court backlogs and delays.

The Commission regards supernumerary status for judges to be consistent with currently evolving views regarding gradual retirement. On the basis of the information given to us by the judges in their submissions before us, we support the supernumerary concept. The cost analysis in this report is predicated on the 50% workload factor.

We would encourage chief justices to continue to carefully monitor the implementation of the supernumerary programme in their respective courts. We would invite the Canadian Judicial Council to consider documenting court management of the supernumerary programme so that it might confirm for future Triennial Commissions whether the basic assumptions surrounding supernumerary service, such as the 50% workload factor, remain valid in the years ahead as the number of supernumerary judges increases.

A. The Rule of Eighty and Supernumerary Service

Predicated on the judges' representations, we consider the supernumerary programme to be providing a valuable contribution toward the effective and efficient administration of the courts. With that in mind, along with the changing age profile of judges referred to earlier, we consider it appropriate for judges to elect supernumerary status under a Rule of 80 formula, provided the judge has served a minimum of 15 years in office and is at least 60 years of age. We would, however, maintain the existing 70/10 supernumerary option.

We therefore recommend that the election of supernumerary status be permitted when a judge has reached at least 60 years of age and has served on the bench for a minimum of 15 years, provided the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80. This Rule of 80 recommendation is identical to our Rule of 80 recommendation regarding retirement which we made in Item D of Chapter X.

B. Ten-year Maximum Supernumerary Service

Concomitant with our recommendation for an extended eligibility to elect to serve as a supernumerary judge, we also recommend that a judge not be permitted to serve for more than 10 years as a supernumerary judge. Consequently, an eligible judge who would elect to serve as a supernumerary judge at younger than 65 years of age would forfeit his or her right to retire at age 75. Should this recommendation be considered to be unconstitutional or, once enacted, be so found, as a result of the 75 years mandatory retirement age in subsection 99(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, then we would recommend that the minimum age for the election of supernumerary status remain, or be increased (as the case may be), to age 65. However, since we recognize the value of supernumerary service, and have concerns only with respect to the workload capacity of supernumerary judges who are approaching the mandatory retirement age of 75, we suggest that future Triennial Commissions may want to re-examine the 10-year supernumerary limit on the basis of information which might then be available regarding the 50% average workload of supernumerary judges.

XII. INCOME TAX HARMONIZATION

The income tax rules relating to retirement savings have been extensively revised over the past few years. The stated objectives of these income tax reforms were to ensure that all taxpayers are provided with a similar opportunity to save for retirement on a tax-assisted basis and to ensure that the costs of pension plans and benefits are measurable according to common standards.

The new pension rules are extremely complex. Simply put, the rules now restrict the benefits that may be provided under a defined benefit Registered Pension Plan (R.P.P.), and in this way limit the amount of tax assistance provided to such plans. (A defined benefit pension plan is a plan that provides a specified level of benefits, regardless of the cost of providing those benefits.) An employer who wants to provide pension benefits in excess of those permissible under an R.P.P. must establish a separate Retirement Compensation Arrangement (R.C.A.) for this purpose, which then becomes subject to rules of its own.

The Department of Finance assured the Commission that the restructuring of the judicial pension plan into a combination of an R.P.P. (that is to say, a base pension plan that is to be registered for income tax purposes) and an R.C.A. or supplementary plan, can take place without any change to the benefits payable to judges and their survivors. The Commission accepts this assurance, and recognizes that the R.P.P./R.C.A. regime would have no practical effect on the amount or administration of judges' pensions.

Judges' pensions are rooted in the constitution. This constitutional foundation, arising from the exigencies of judicial independence, marks the judicial pension plan as unique. The entire scheme, with the sole exception of pension indexing, is provided for and administered in accordance with the Judges Act. In view of the Department of Finance's assertion that the R.P.P./R.C.A. regime would have no practical impact on judges' pensions, we see no compelling reason to restructure or transform the Judges Act to embrace the entire R.P.P./R.C.A. regime.

We note that the Judges Act, at subsection 50(3), currently contains a clause which deems a judge's statutory pension contributions to be made to or under a registered pension plan or fund. The clear purpose of that deeming provision is to enable the judge to deduct those contributions from income for tax purposes; the provision essentially creates a legal fiction. The Commission believes that the R.P.P./R.C.A. restructuring should also be made applicable to judges by means of a deeming provision. We therefore recommend that the Judges Act be amended to provide that the judges' pension scheme is deemed to be a Registered Pension Plan up to the limits provided therefor under the Income Tax Act and regulations, and is deemed to be a Retirement Compensation Arrangement for the excess.

In our view, a deeming provision of that nature would be entirely consistent with our belief, referred to at Chapter VIII with regard to judges' R.R.S.P. contribution limits, that as a matter of general tax policy all taxpayers should be placed on the same footing. The deeming clause would also conform to our belief, mentioned in Items C and G of Chapter X, and rooted in the understanding that judges' pensions are an essential component of their financial security and judicial independence, that all aspects of their pensions should be governed by the Minister of Justice and administered by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs pursuant to provisions contained in the Judges Act.

XIII. JUDICIAL ALLOWANCES

The Commission has examined the status of a number of the statutory allowances under the Judges Act. In particular, we have looked at the amount and adequacy of the incidental allowance (subsection 27(1)); the northern allowance (subsection 27(2)); the representational allowance (subsection 27(7)); the removal allowance (section 40); and the conference allowance (subsection 41(3)).

We note that in the case of every one of these allowances, statutory improvements have either been implemented following the recommendations of the 1986 (Guthrie) Triennial Commission or introduced (but not yet enacted) through Bill C-50 as a result of the recommendations of the 1989 (Courtois) Triennial Commission. We believe that once Bill C-50, or its successor legislation in the current or a new parliamentary session, is enacted, those allowances will be adequate and in any event may be examined again by the next Triennial Commission.

We also want to mention the submission made to this Commission on behalf of the superior court judges serving in the two territories. We appreciate the higher cost of living that comes with service in the north, and recognize that the current $6,000 northern allowance might not fully compensate for those increased costs. However, we do not believe that varying the northern allowance annually by tying it to increases in judicial salaries is the appropriate method of dealing with the higher cost of living. The judges' annual salary adjustment based on a statutory indexing formula serves a special purpose relating to judicial independence, and we do not believe it should be used for calculating the northern allowance as well.

The Commission is not persuaded that there is a sufficient basis to increase the northern allowance by any amount. The existing $6,000 allowance is already unique in that the Judges Act does not recognize other regional cost disparities that exist across Canada.

XIV. NON-STATUTORY BENEFITS

The Commission considers the judges to have, in the aggregate, very good basic insurance and medical coverage. If a judge dies in office, his or her surviving spouse is entitled to an annuity equal to one-third of the judge's salary (to be increased to 40% under Bill C-50) and a lump-sum statutory payment of one-sixth of salary. The surviving spouse of a retired judge who dies is entitled to receive an annuity equal to half of the judge's annuity (to be increased to 60% under Bill C-50). Surviving minor children or those in full-time attendance at a school or university are also entitled to annuities. Under the Judges Act, a judge who is unable to continue on the bench due to a permanent infirmity is entitled to retire with a full pension of two-thirds of salary. A judge with a lesser disability, but lasting longer than 30 days, may apply for a leave of absence and continues to receive full salary while on leave. Of course, each judge is also covered by the public health insurance plan of his or her province or territory of residence. Bill C-50 would make judges eligible under the Government Employees Compensation Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. G-5) for the purposes of compensation for injuries.

In addition to their statutory allowances and entitlements, judges also receive a number of non-statutory benefits related to life, health and dental group insurance and accident insurance. For instance, judges can participate in both the Public Service Management Insurance Plan (P.S.M.I.P.) and the Public Service Health Care Plan (P.S.H.C.P.), taking advantage in both plans of the federal public service's highly competitive group rates. The judges also participate in the Public Service Dental Care Plan (P.S.D.C.P.) at no charge to either themselves or their dependents. We see no need to specifically augment these broad and comprehensive coverages for the judges alone.

The P.S.M.I.P coverage, which is optional, includes life insurance, accidental death and dismemberment insurance, and dependents' insurance. As an example, maximum life insurance coverage available under this plan could provide a lump sum benefit upon the judge's death of twice his or her salary, which is in addition to the survivor benefits under the judges' pension plan. Premiums vary with age, sex and coverage chosen; due to a partial premium holiday in effect at the time of writing our report, a 50-year-old male judge would pay less than $22 per month for the maximum coverage available.

The P.S.H.C.P. includes coverage for both the judge and his or her dependents, and consists of drug benefits (80% of costs paid); vision care benefits (including 80% of the costs of eyeglasses and contact lenses, to maximum annual limits); health practitioners benefits (including costs of private-care nurses, physiotherapists, psychologists, speech and language pathologists, and the like, to maximum annual limits); out-of-province benefits (including travel and emergency travel assistance benefits, to maximum limits); miscellaneous expense benefits (including 80% of the costs of medically prescribed hearing aids, air and ground ambulance service, orthopaedic shoes, and so on, to maximum annual limits); benefits relating to hospital expenses incurred outside of Canada (subject to per-trip limits); and benefits relating to hospital care within Canada (including semi-private or private room accommodation, to maximum daily limits).

Judges, retired judges and surviving spouses in receipt of annuities under the Judges Act are all entitled to participate in the P.S.H.C.P. Family coverage to the highest level currently costs a judge less than $10 per month.

In addition to participating in the P.S.M.I.P., the P.S.H.C.P. and the P.S.D.C.P., judges are also eligible to participate in an optional supplementary catastrophic health insurance plan which has been arranged between the Canadian Judges' Conference and a private carrier. This optional plan is not subsidized, although the monthly premium of $105 (for family coverage) is deducted at source by the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

XV. MATERNITY/PARENTAL LEAVE

Under section 54 of the Judges Act, a judge who is absent from his or her judicial duties for a period in excess of 30 days requires Governor in Council approval of the absence. The approval for this paid leave of absence is granted by order-in-council. The Commission notes that this leave of absence provision is sufficiently flexible, and has been so used in the past, to authorize maternity leave for a female judge during pregnancy or following the birth or adoption of a child.

Notwithstanding the availability of a section 54 leave of absence for maternity and possibly parental leave purposes, we believe that the social benefits attributable to allowing a parent to be with her or his newborn or newly adopted child are sufficiently evident to justify reducing the decision-making authority for judicial maternity/parental leave to the chief justice level from the Governor in Council. We therefore recommend that the Judges Act be amended to permit a chief justice to authorize up to 6 months of maternity/parental leave: (i) for a female judge on his or her court who is pregnant, has recently given birth or has recently adopted a child; and (ii) for a male judge following the birth or adoption of his child. This period of maternity/parental leave should have no effect on the judge's salary. An aggregate of 6 months of maternity/parental leave seems appropriate and is in accordance with federal unemployment insurance legislation. We would invite chief justices to take into account the amount of maternity/parental leave being taken by the other parent when considering how much maternity/parental leave to grant to the judge.

Whenever a judge is absent from his or her judicial duties for a period in excess of 30 days, the requirement in subsection 54(3) that he or she report the absence and the reasons therefor to the Minister of Justice should continue.

XVI. COSTING METHODOLOGY

The terms of reference of this Commission, unlike those of previous Triennial Commissions, specifically request that we cost our recommendations. We were therefore required to consider how best to discharge our duty in that regard within the limited time available.

We considered it advisable to develop a costing methodology that was sufficiently general yet comprehensive enough to apply to our recommendations as well as to the recommendations of future Triennial Commissions. We believe that the credibility and comparability of costings would be enhanced if this and subsequent Commissions use a consistent cost methodology.

We came to the conclusion that the best way to measure the costs of our recommendations was by determining the difference between the cost of the total compensation package enjoyed by judges before and after implementing our recommendations. This total compensation cost approach automatically accounts for the interactions between the various components of the judges' salary, allowance and benefits package. In addition, by providing a global value of judicial salaries and benefits, a standard of comparison is available between the judges' compensation package and that of public servants and the private sector.

The Commission considered the advisability of developing an independent set of assumptions for the purpose of the costing process. We noted that the cost of our recommendations is the difference between the cost of the total compensation package for judges before and after implementing our recommendations; therefore, the estimated costs are not too sensitive to variations in the assumptions used, if those variations are held within a reasonable range.

We concluded that it would be prudent to use the same assumptions that are used by the federal government in reporting its liabilities in the Public Accounts. These assumptions are not very different from those used by the Chief Actuary in the triennial actuarial reviews prescribed under the Public Pensions Reporting Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. P-31.4). The Public Account assumptions are deemed to represent best estimates from the point of view of the Government, which is the payor of judicial compensation. Furthermore, in our view these assumptions should be regarded by the judges as providing a reasonable estimate of the value of their salary and benefits package.

As the assumptions used for the Public Accounts will be updated from time to time to reflect current conditions, future Triennial Commissions could follow the same approach and thereby avoid possible criticism for making what might appear to be arbitrary changes in the assumptions.

Appendix D describes more fully the Total Compensation concept and cost methodology, including the assumptions used. The Commission is satisfied that this total compensation cost approach is most appropriate for measuring and comparing total compensation costs for judges. As a matter of ease of reference, the Appendix terminology refers to "employer" and "employee", but these terms should be understood in the generic sense that judges are "employed" by the people of Canada. We recognize that judges hold an "office" which is based on the constitution and enshrined in the Judges Act. The independence of the judiciary requires this to be the case.

We have used the Level of Benefit Method, as described in Appendix D, because it allows for the comparison of hypothetical compensation packages while eliminating the distortions which would arise from a variation in the number of judges from year to year or from variations in the distribution by age, sex or years of service on the bench. This Method accommodates the prospective nature of our recommendations and enables us to measure their cost implications with an accuracy limited only by the availability of experience data and the necessity of relying on assumptions.

Of the actuarial cost methods that were considered, we have used the Level Entry Age Cost Method, described in Appendix D, to produce estimates of the pension costs because it automatically averages total compensation over the career of the judges. It avoids the necessity of making a number of assumptions as to the apportionment of benefits over successive periods and about blending costs while supernumerary with costs while fully active. This actuarial cost method is particularly suitable with respect to the judges' pension scheme where benefits are granted globally and not explicitly apportioned on a year-by-year basis.

One particular difficulty has been the determination of a rate of total compensation per period, since the work period for a judge can extend far beyond his or her sitting times. This is an important consideration because a change in working conditions which reduces the work period for a given amount of compensation results in a cost increase and vice versa. For the purpose of doing this costing, some workload assumptions had to be made, which are not meant to imply actual circumstances. After consideration of various alternatives, we have chosen to use as an estimate a work period of 1.5 times the work period that a judge is available for sitting on the bench. On the basis of judges being available for sitting 32 weeks per year, each is deemed to work approximately 48 weeks per year. This approximation can be extended to supernumerary judges, where wide variations in the work period can be expected, but where we have assumed a 50% workload. Assuming the availability of supernumerary status results in a higher average retirement age for judges, costs are affected in two opposite ways:

- pension costs are reduced by postponing the retirement age, and the cost per period is further reduced by an increase in the average period worked (since judges' pensions are not the accrual-type); and

- salary costs are increased because the full salary is paid for a shorter annual work period.

Similarly, some reduction in the average period effectively worked had to be made to take into account leaves of absence, maternity/parental leaves and short-term disabilities. In the absence of suitable data, an arbitrary estimate of one week per year has been used, which could be revised as experience data is accumulated. Although there are obviously some costs associated with our recommendations in Chapter XV, given this arbitrary approximation it is not captured by the calculations. However, we believe these costs to be quite marginal.

We strongly suggest that work be undertaken in advance of the next Triennial Commission to facilitate the full application of the Total Compensation Cost Method to all components of judicial compensation and to accumulate the experience data necessary to confirm or modify the assumptions which have been used.

Section 6 of Appendix D summarizes the cost of the components of Total Compensation for the general case of puisne judges. The various allowances provided for in the Judges Act have been treated as amounts paid in exchange for expenses assumed by the judges, not for work done, and have thus not been deemed a compensation component. Section 5 of Appendix D summarizes the calculations made to take into account the differentials for judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and for chief justices.

Assuming the salary freeze for the 2 years beginning April 1, 1993, proceeds in accordance with clause 10 of Bill C-113, it might be noted that the cost of our recommendations for that period is limited to the impact of the Rule of 80. However, for the third year, beginning April 1, 1995, our recommendations infer a judicial salary increase equal to the percentage increase in the Industrial Aggregate, as stipulated in section 25 of the Judges Act, and this increase has been reflected in the estimated costs.

The average compensation per week worked and the increase over the base year are estimated as follows:

	Average per week worked	Increase per week worked
Base year	$ 4,947	—
First year	$ 5,069	$ 122
Second year	$ 5,069	$ 122
Third year	$ 5,196	$ 249

In order to compare the cost of a constant amount of services, the calculation of the aggregate costs needs to be adjusted to take into account the reduction in the average number of weeks worked per year resulting from the introduction of the Rule of 80. As the expected average number of weeks worked before the change is 0.986% higher, the calculation reflects the fact that to maintain the same level of services an increase of 0.986% in the number of judges would be required.

The increase in the accrued pension liabilities due to the introduction of the Rule of 80 is a non-recurring cost that could be deemed allocated to the first year. Since the change benefits the judges currently in office, we have considered it reasonable to allocate it over the Expected Average Remaining Service Life of these judges, estimated at 12.0 years. This results in an increase of $1,626,000 per year for the next 12 years rather than $12 million in the first year.

The aggregate costs of our recommendations are therefore estimated as follows, expressed as an increase over the base year:

	$ millions
01/04/93 - 31/03/94	6.1
01/04/94 - 31/03/95	6.1
01/04/95 - 31/03/96	10.8
Total	23.0

These estimates assume that our recommendations apply as of April 1, 1993.

More details are available in Appendix D.

XVII. CONCLUSION

Judges are not in a position to negotiate with the Government with respect to their salaries, pensions and benefits. According to constitutional law, doctrine and jurisprudence, the independence of the judiciary rests to a significant degree on the nature of their compensation package. Parliament has legislated the Triennial Commission process in recognition of this unique role and standing of the judiciary. The purpose of the Triennial Commission is to examine judges' remuneration in a non-partisan and objective manner, in the context of prevailing economic conditions, and to make recommendations to the Minister of Justice which would serve to reinforce the fundamental principle of judicial independence.

The worthy objectives of this process require the timely response of the Minister, the Government and Parliament to the recommendations contained in this report.

XVIII. SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That the Government of the day state its response to the recommendations of a Triennial Commission, and introduce its resultant legislation, as soon as feasible but in any event within 20 sitting days after the expiry of a nine-month period immediately following the submission of the Triennial Commission report to the Minister of Justice (Chapter III).

2. That Triennial Commission members be called as witnesses by parliamentary standing and legislative committees to elaborate on and support their recommendations (Chapter III).

3. That the process whereby federal government departments provide documentation and background materials to Triennial Commissions, including the possibility of Department of Justice and other federal government officials appearing at Commission hearings to present departmental positions on relevant issues, be encouraged and even formalized (Chapter IV).

4. That the practice of holding open hearings be continued by future Triennial Commissions (Chapter IV).

5. That rough equivalence with the mid-point of the DM-3 salary range be the appropriate benchmark by which to gauge puisne judges' salaries (Chapter V).

6. That no exception be made for judges with respect to the changes in the R.R.S.P. deductibility rules implemented by the amendments to the Income Tax Act contained in S.C. 1990, c. 35 and the regulations thereunder (Chapter VIII).

7. That contributions, benefits, interest and liabilities for the judges' pension scheme be accounted for distinctly in the Pension Accounts (Chapter X, Item B).

8. That the provisions for indexing judicial annuities, including those of surviving spouses and eligible children, should be transferred to the Judges Act from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (Chapter X, Item C).

9. That retirement at full pension be permitted when a judge has reached at least 60 years of age and has served on the bench for a minimum of 15 years, provided the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80 (Chapter X, Item D).

10. That judges be permitted to retire with a full pension after serving for a minimum of 10 years on the Supreme Court of Canada and reaching the age of 65 years (Chapter X, Item F).

11. That the Judges Act be amended to incorporate therein the relevant credit splitting provisions of the Pension Benefits Division Act, with such changes as the circumstances require (Chapter X, Item G).

12. That the election of supernumerary status be permitted when a judge has reached at least 60 years of age and has served on the bench for a minimum of 15 years, provided the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80 (Chapter XI, Item A).

13. That a judge not be permitted to serve for more than 10 years as a supernumerary judge (Chapter XI, Item B).

14. That the Judges Act be amended to provide that the judges' pension scheme is deemed to be a Registered Pension Plan up to the limits provided therefor under the Income Tax Act and regulations, and is deemed to be a Retirement Compensation Arrangement for the excess (Chapter XII).

15. That the Judges Act be amended to permit a chief justice to authorize up to 6 months of maternity/parental leave: (i) for a female judge on his or her court who is pregnant, has recently given birth or has recently adopted a child; and (ii) for a male judge following the birth or adoption of his child (Chapter XV).

All of which is respectfully submitted this 31st day of March, 1993.

1992 COMMISSION ON JUDGES' SALARIES AND BENEFITS

NOTICE

This Commission was appointed on September 30, 1992 by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act to federally appointed judges and into the adequacy of federally appointed judges' benefits generally, including the granting of annuities provided to judges and to their surviving spouses and children.

The Commission invites written submissions in either official language concerning the matters within the Commission's terms of reference. Written submissions must reach the Commission by November 30, 1992, in ten copies. A party intending to file a written submission with the Commission may also request an opportunity to make a presentation at an oral hearing. The Commission must be notified by November 20, 1992 of the party's desire to appear at an oral hearing. A party filing a written submission need not request to appear at an oral hearing.

Copies of the Commission's terms of reference are available upon request.

COMMISSION DE 1992 SUR LE TRAITEMENT ET LES AVANTAGES DES JUGES

AVIS

La Commission de 1992 sur le traitement et les avantages des juges a été instituée le 30 septembre 1992 par la ministre de la Justice et procureure générale du Canada, en application de l'article 26 de la Loi sur les juges. Elle a pour mandat de déterminer si le traitement et les avantages des juges nommés par le gouvernement fédéral ainsi que les pensions auxquelles ceux-ci, leur conjoint et leurs enfants ont droit, sont satisfaisants.

La Commission invite toute personne intéressée à lui soumettre par écrit ses vues sur les sujets qu'elle a reçu pour mission d'examiner. Ces interventions doivent prendre la forme d'un document écrit, établi dans l'une ou l'autre des deux langues officielles, et être déposées auprès de la Commission en dix exemplaires au plus tard le 30 novembre 1992. Quiconque dépose un tel document écrit peut en outre demander à la Commission d'être entendu par celle-ci. En pareil cas, il convient d'aviser la Commission au plus tard le 20 novembre 1992 du souhait de présenter des observations orales. Il convient de noter que le dépôt de documents écrits n'oblige nullement à présenter les observations orales.

Il est possible d'obtenir le texte définissant le mandat de la Commission sur simple demande.

APPENDIX D

TOTAL COMPENSATION COST METHODOLOGY

MARCH 1993

TOTAL COMPENSATION

INTRODUCTION

This document presents the concepts underlying a methodology for measuring and comparing total compensation costs.

First, the concept of total compensation is defined. This definition is then used as a framework to identify the various elements composing total compensation.

A specific method to assess and compare total compensation costs in an objective, valid and reliable manner is then presented.

The concept of total compensation has been developed and refined gradually over the years and there are variations both as to the definition of what should be part of compensation and how the cost on the value should be calculated. Essentially the differences arise from the benefit components, since the basic salary itself is unambiguous.

Studies have been published regularly in Canada and in the United States that report on Employee Benefit Costs (1). This concept is underlying studies published by the Pay Research Bureau of Canada (2) and the "Centre de recherche et de statistiques sur le marché du travail" of the Ministry of Labour of Quebec (3).

A more complete description of a Total Compensation Model as well as a discussion of the analytical issues appear in the Proceedings of the Conference on Public Sector Compensation - 1985 under the aegis of the Ontario Economic Council (4). It indicates in the introduction "This model of total compensation was developed to assist the Federal Government (as employer) in understanding the compensation relativities between its employees and those performing comparable work in other sectors of the economy."

The 8th Report of the IRIR(5) contains a description of two costs methodologies : the Cost of Benefit Method also known as Disbursement Method and the Level of Benefit Method also known as Simulated Cost Method. Variations of these methods are used by parties to the negotiations of labour agreements, to support representations made to arbitrators or to establish the cost of labour as part of production costs.

1. OBJECTIVES IN ASSESSING AND COMPARING TOTAL COMPENSATION COSTS

The measurement of total compensation costs can be undertaken to serve a variety of objectives:

- Quantify total compensation costs in an objective, valid and reliable manner.
- Identify differences in total compensation that are related to conditions of employment only, avoiding artificial value differences resulting from factors such as work force characteristics or financing strategy.
- Determine the cost impact of compensation changes.
- Compare different total compensation packages.

The use of the term "costs" implies that the measurement is done from the point of view of the employer, i.e. the payor. However, it can equally be seen as a quantification of the value of the Total Compensation package from the point of view of an employee. The objectives can be similar and help an employee choose between different offers or between working and not working. It should be stressed however that, to the extent the measurement rests on assumptions, including probabilities, it measures an average value for an individual as a member of a group or what could be called a fair market value. Effective values or perceived values would depend on individual characteristics, preferences and other subjective factors.

The words "costs" and "value" implicitly exclude elements of compensation that, for practical purposes, do not have a calculable monetary value. It would therefore exclude intangibles such as the prestige of a function, the intellectual reward resulting from personal achievement or development, the quality of the environment including the human elements, etc. Although it could be debated, we exclude elements such as training which are less intangible but could be seen also as an investment by the employer.

We are also excluding the overhead costs of providing the elements of compensation, as it would confuse the relation between costs and value.

2. THE CONCEPT OF TOTAL COMPENSATION

Total compensation includes all the conditions, contractual or statutory which usually result in a financial commitment by the employer, in respect of employees or for their benefit which the employer meets in exchange for the work performed for a given period.

- Using the neutral term "conditions" rather than "benefits" indicates that it is not necessary for an employee to actually benefit from a provision for it to be considered as compensation. The employer's contributions to a provincial medical plan such as OHIP, for example, would be deemed compensation, even if the employee does not derive any particular benefit from them. This concept assumes that all the financial costs to the employer must be included.

- "Contractual or statutory": compensation conditions are "contractual" when they are agreed to between the employee and the employer and "statutory" when they arise from legislation or government programs (CQPP, unemployment insurance, workers compensation). It is not necessary for a condition to be the subject of a collective or written agreement for it to be considered as contractual. "Company" management practices may enter into this price (e.g. employee assistance programs).

- "Which result in a financial commitment": this statement restricts the definition of compensation to items which can be quantified in monetary terms. The definition is more conventional and operational than one which would include non-monetary benefits. There are no definite limits for compensation and, consequently, for its measurement if one looks beyond the financial framework. This does not mean that non-monetary items are not significant but that they are considered, not as items making up compensation, but as variables which must be taken into account in the analysis and that may explain the variances observed due to qualitative differences.

- The use of the term "commitment" rather than "payment" indicates that it is not necessary for the employer to make disbursements although the employer is committed to do so if the case arises. An indemnity to be paid related to a termination under specific conditions is an example of a case where a commitment is made which might never require disbursements, but it would nevertheless be considered as compensation.

- "By the employer" indicates that the benefits that the employee derives from his/her employment but which the employee pays for himself/herself (contributions to benefits, social club) are not considered to be compensation.

- "Usually" means that a benefit offered by an employer (e.g. job security) which usually incurs costs is considered as compensation even if, for a particular employer, no disbursements or contractual commitments are required if the employees are still entitled to the benefit because of the company's management policies. Conversely, a benefit which does not usually cost anything, and which for particular reasons would be costly for the employer, would not constitute a form of compensation (e.g. special transportation to bring the employees to work in an isolated area).

- "Respecting the employees or for their benefit" refers to direct compensation regarding all amounts paid to the employee as well as to indirect compensation paid to third parties in the employee's name. The amounts paid to third parties may be in the form of the purchase of services (e.g. insurance premiums) or operating expenditures (e.g. subsidized meals).

- "Which the employer meets" means that the employer who meets a condition in actual fact is considered to be paying compensation, even when there is no obligation to continue to do so.

- "In exchange for work performed" means that not all payments are included. The reimbursement of expenses incurred (use of equipment, automobile, traveling expenses) is done in exchange for the expenses assumed by the employee and not for the work done.

- "For a given period" means that compensation always applies to a period of time. The absolute value of the compensation is meaningless if we do not know whether it corresponds to a given annual, monthly, weekly, daily or hourly amount. The unit of measure must also be dated and thus define the period of reference.

3. COMPENSATION ELEMENTS

In assessing total compensation, the elements to be considered vary according to the situation reviewed and existing conditions of employment (as well as with data availability). Such elements may comprise:

1. Direct compensation

- 1.1 Base salary
- 1.2 Incentives (bonus, commissions, lump sums) linked to job content or performance
- 1.3 Premium pay
- 1.4 Overtime
- 1.5 Reimbursement of sick leave days
- 1.6 Allowances

2. Indirect compensation

- 2.1 Income protection
  - 2.1.1 Disability insurance premiums (short term and long term)
  - 2.1.2 Job security (including severance pay and supplemental unemployment benefit insurance)
  - 2.1.3 Pension plan contributions
- 2.2 Health, accident, liability protection
  - 2.2.1 Life insurance
  - 2.2.2 Supplementary health insurance
  - 2.2.3 Dental plan
  - 2.2.4 Additional protection (liability insurance, car insurance, etc.)
- 2.3 Legally required payments
  - 2.3.1 Unemployment insurance
  - 2.3.2 Basic health insurance
  - 2.3.3 Workers compensation
  - 2.3.4 Quebec / Canada pension plan
  - 2.3.5 Labour standards

2.4 Services and gratuities

- 2.4.1 Educational fees
- 2.4.2 Company car
- 2.4.3 Transportation and parking
- 2.4.4 Employer sponsored meals
- 2.4.5 Employee assistance program
- 2.4.6 Retirement counseling
- 2.4.7 Professional membership fees
- 2.4.8 Nursery
- 2.4.9 Others

3. Working days

- 3.1 Standard number of working days
- 3.2 Overtime hours (if applicable)

4. Pay for time not worked

- 4.1 Holidays
- 4.2 Vacations
- 4.3 Parental leave (paternity and maternity)
- 4.4 Funeral leave, jury duty, etc.
- 4.5 Education leave with pay
- 4.6 Sick days

When using a total compensation approach to compare the cost of a different compensation package, we also have to determine to what extent the jobs for which the compensation comparisons are made are comparable in terms of content. In this case, because of the types of comparison involved, this determination is not relevant.

4. METHODOLOGY

4.1 Total Compensation Valuation Method

Different approaches are available to assess total compensation costs.

One approach consists in assigning subjective values to each element of the compensation package. These values are then compared to values assigned to similar compensation elements offered to other employees. The result is more a qualitative assessment of the value of total compensation comparisons.

Under this approach, called the Gross Comparison Method, the cost of implementing new or modified compensation elements cannot be calculated. Hence this method only ranks benefits and distinguishes between the best, next to best or less acceptable ones. It only resolves that benefits are above, below or at par when compared with others.

At best, this method has the merit of simplicity but produces only a superficial comparison.

Another approach, the Cost of Benefit Method, compares actual disbursements made by different employers for employees in comparable job classifications. It has the advantage of being applicable on the basis of information available from financial statements. It is also promoted as more factual than calculations based on assumptions. This method compares only expenditures without determining the amount or quality of compensation being provided to employees. An equal dollar amount spent by two different employers does not necessarily amount to similar quality and quantity of compensation to employees because it may reflect a different financing method or a different work force distribution.

Hence we can question the effectiveness of this method as a means of comparing total compensation packages. Furthermore because it only uses information on expenditures, this method is not suitable to assess the cost impact of changing or modifying compensation elements in the current compensation package for a given group of employees until after the facts.

A third approach, the Level of Benefit Method, can be used to assess total compensation costs. This method involves calculating the costs incurred by the employer to provide its employees with a compensation package, current or simulated.

The level of benefits method allows for calculating the value of compensation in comparison to compensation offered to different employee groups working for the same employer or for similar employee groups working for other employers. This method allows for a calculation of the costs that would be incurred by an employer if it were to provide its employees with a modified compensation package.

This method avoids the artificial value differences resulting from such factors as funding, utilization experience, or work force characteristics. Further, this method requires only descriptive information on provisions and characteristics of compensation elements applicable to the employees for whom the assessment is to be made. No information is necessary on the actual expenditures being incurred.

Under this approach, the value of each element of compensation is first assessed individually and then all elements values are integrated into a composite measure of total compensation. For some elements, the valuation process is relatively straightforward (for example, number of paid holidays) but for others, like pension and insurance-type elements, the valuation process can be complex, involving actuarial methods.

Under this model, the term "value" (of compensation) is used to ensure that there is no confusion with actual expenditures. Since the analyses are based on models of benefits and their usage, it is important to make clear that figures used are not exactly the same as expenditures.

We recommend using this Level of Benefit Method for total compensation comparison purposes.

4.2 Total Compensation Formula

After the various compensation elements have been identified, and their value established under the level of benefits method, the issue of days of work and time off with pay arise.

Hence, the sum of the estimated or actual expenses from the various compensation elements only represents an incomplete measure of total compensation, since it does not take into consideration days of work and time off with pay.

The method presented incorporates these issues by presenting total compensation in the form of the monetary value of all compensation elements involving an expense in relation to weeks actually worked.

This measure best reconciles the net average value of compensation to a group of employees under a level-of-benefits approach with the cost of compensation to the employer. As a formula, the value of total compensation is expressed as:

$$\text{Total compensation per week worked} = \frac{\text{Direct compensation (annual)} + \text{Indirect compensation (annual)}}{\text{Regular weeks paid (annual)} - \text{Weeks paid but not worked (annual)}}$$

For some occupations, we may deal with days or hours: the denominator is then calculated in terms of net days or hours worked, producing the measure dollars-per-day or dollars-per-hour rather than dollars-per-week as the standard of comparison. In either case, the equation provides a common basis for comparing the value of compensation packages that might be quite different both in terms of benefits or work requirements.

By subtracting the paid time-off period rather than adding an equivalent monetary value, there is no systematic overstatement of the aggregate monetary value.

In the case of Federally Appointed Judges, we are not dealing with a conventional employer-employee relationship. The determination of the regular work period, for example, must reflect the special characteristics of judicial duties. The regular weeks worked have been estimated as 150 % of the number of weeks spent in the courtroom to allow for decision-writing weeks. On the basis of 32 weeks spent in the courtroom, the number of regular weeks worked is 48, leaving 4 weeks as an estimate for the vacation period paid but not worked.

For Supernumerary Judges, it is necessary to adjust the denominator to reflect the change in the weeks worked. As a first approximation, we have increased the weeks not worked by 50 % of the weeks worked to reflect a 50 % reduction in the regular workload. Hence the number of regular weeks worked is reduced to 24 weeks.

To take into account the reduced number of weeks, we have calculated the average number of regular weeks worked during the career of a judge using the Expected Average Service Life as an active Judge and the Expected Average Service Life as a Supernumerary Judge.

In either case, we also needed an estimate of the average number of days not worked pursuant to a leave of absence, maternity or parental leave or short-term disability. In the absence of more suitable data, an arbitrary estimate of one week has been used both before and after Recommendations. Therefore our calculations do not quantify the cost of this change which we consider marginal.

4.3 Reference Situation

When assessing the cost of total compensation packages, a reference situation is always used and should include the following elements:

- Reference period: compensation packages are in force at a given date for a given period; in the case of the present calculation, we refer to the compensation package in force as at April 1, 1992, and the reference period is April 1992 to March 1993.

- Reference population: to estimate costs resulting from the application of a set of conditions of employment and of associated working days, we need to define and use a reference population and experience that will be used to isolate changes in conditions of employment. The actual population of judges as at the beginning of the reference period is used as the standard for the purpose of the study.

4.4 Actuarial Valuation

An actuarial methodology is used to determine the cost of some of the elements of the compensation package being assessed.

These valuations forecast future expenditures related to the plans in effect, and then convert these future costs into a present value. This methodology requires the use of demographic and economic assumptions.

ASSUMPTIONS

Generally, when a pension plan is offered, it is considered convenient to use the same demographic and economic assumptions as the ones used in the valuation process for the pension plan because this plan represents a large proportion of the costs. In the present situation, the assumptions used in the actuarial valuations, as prepared by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions of Canada for reporting in the Public Accounts, have been selected. These assumptions are summarized in the Appendix.

METHODS

Different actuarial methods can be used.

Entry Age Method

This method calculates the present value of the projected benefits up to the date of termination, at the age the employees are hired or start participating in the plan.

This present value of benefits is then divided by the present value of salary for the period starting at the age of entry until the age at the date of termination. The cost of the benefit is then presented as a uniform percentage of salary during the career of the employee.

The cost, thus determined, does not vary with attained age or service but is stable over the career of the employees.

Unit Credit Method

Under this method, we calculate the present value at the present age of the projected benefits in respect of service in the following year. The cost of benefit can then be expressed as a percentage of the salary projected for that following year.

The cost is less stable because it varies according to age. But when applied to a group of employees, the average age is more stable and that method can be used to evaluate certain benefits (for reasons of simplicity) when we can assess that its use is not going to bring distortion in the valuation. For example, taking into account existing commercial practices to cover insurance, that approach could be suitable to evaluate health insurance costs even though it is known that the underlying costs vary by age.

To illustrate the difference between the two methods, let us take the following vacation schedule:

- 2 weeks after 1 year of service
- 3 weeks after 3 years of service
- 4 weeks after 10 years of service

Under the Entry Age Method, taking into consideration the overall career, we could determine, under the proper set of assumptions, that the schedule is equivalent in cost to a uniform 3.25 weeks per year.

Under the Unit Credit Method, the results would be 2 weeks between 1 and 3 years, 3 weeks between 3 and 10 years, and 4 weeks after.

The Unit Credit Method would be the average results taking into account the number of employees in each service group. In the case of an employer having currently no employees with more than 10 years of service, the advantage of the 4 weeks after 10 years would not be reflected in the calculation.

The Entry Age Method captures more faithfully all the features of a compensation package notwithstanding the current age and service distribution of the group under study. This method is thus more suitable to measure the value of Total Compensation averaged over a full career.

However, in the circumstances, given that the benefits other than pension are not modified and that the vacation period is deemed equal at all ages, we have deemed the one-year cost to be a satisfactory substitute for costs established under the Entry Age Method.

5. TOTAL COMPENSATION COSTS ESTIMATES

The number of judges is as at March 31, 1992, and the salary rate for the two years beginning April 1, 1993, is the rate applicable on April 1, 1992, while the salary rate for the third year incorporates the automatic indexing provided under Section 25 of the Judges Act projected at 2.5% on the basis of the actuarial assumptions used for the valuation of the Pension Plan. It is further assumed that the costs of the other components, on the average, remain constant as a percentage of salary.

In order to estimate the Total Compensation Costs we have first calculated the Total Compensation Costs on the basis of the estimates of Section 6 applicable to a Puisne Judge. This first total is then adjusted to take into account the salary differential for Supreme Court Judges and Chief Justices. Pension costs for the differential over the Puisne rate have been estimated on the basis of the same percentage as calculated for the all the Judges. For compensation components other than Pension, no adjustment to the differential over the Puisne rate is necessary because the total cost has been allocated already as a percentage of the Puisne rate.

These calculations are as follows :

	Prior to recommendations	First and second year	Third year
A. Total compensation at Puisne rate
Total compensation	$ 201,559	$ 204,519	$ 209,632
Total number of judges	898	898	898
Total compensation at Puisne rate	$ 180,999,982	$ 183,658,062	$ 188,249,514
B. Differentials
Chief Justices
Base salary differential	$ 14,200	$ 14,200	$ 14,555
Number of Chief Justices	36	36	36
Subtotal for Chief Justices	$ 511,200	$ 511,200	$ 523,980
Supreme Court Judges
Base salary differential
Judges	$ 29,400	$ 29,400	$ 30,135
Chief Justice	$ 44,100	$ 44,100	$ 45,202
Number of Judges	8	8	8
Number of Chief Justices	1	1	1
Subtotal for Supreme Court	$ 279,300	$ 279,300	$ 286,282
TOTAL SALARY DIFFERENTIALS	$ 790,500	$ 790,500	$ 810,262
C. Pension differentials as per line 2.1.3 Section 6	$ 207,900	$ 222,921	$ 228,494
D. Total compensation costs	$ 181,998,382	$ 184,671,483	$ 189,288,270

The average compensation cost per week worked is obtained by dividing Total Compensation Costs by the number of weeks worked, taking into account the assumed duration of leaves of absence and the reduced regular workload during the Supernumerary period. With the introduction of the Rule of 80, the average number of weeks in the regular work year is reduced by the increased proportion of the period served as Supernumerary over the career of a judge. The weighted average is calculated by applying the expected number of years in each status to 24 weeks and 48 weeks respectively. The reduction is as follows:

	Current conditions	After Rule of 80
Expected average service life (years)
As Supernumerary Judge	5.43	5.47
Other than as Supernumerary	16.17	14.96
Total number of years	21.60	20.43
Weighted expected average regular work load	41.97	41.57
Reduction from regular 48 weeks	6.03	6.43
Expected number of weeks worked	40.97	40.57

The average Total Compensation Cost per week worked is thus as follows:

Prior to recommendations	$ 4,947
First and second year	$ 5,069
Third year	$ 5,196

The average number of weeks worked by a judge is 0.986% higher before the change, that is 40.97 versus 40.57. Therefore, to produce the same number of weeks worked, the number of judges would need to be increased by 0.986%. The aggregate cost increases resulting from the recommendations can be obtained by multiplying the cost increase per week worked by the aggregate number of weeks worked as at 4/1/92 before change, that is 36,791 weeks (898 x 40.97) versus 36,432 weeks (898 x 40.57) after change.

The effect of the introduction of the Rule of 80 on the cost of the Pension Plan has been estimated on the basis of Entry Age Normal Cost. The entry ages assumed have been based on the 1989-91 experience. The retirement rates have been adjusted to take into account the shift in the age at which judges become eligible to retire and hence become eligible to Supernumerary status. The adjustment has been deemed sufficient, in aggregate, to cover the change in the retirement age for Supreme Court Judges.

The increase in the Normal Cost measures the effect on the cost as if the new rule had applied over the whole career of the judges, thus measuring the long term effect. In addition, the introduction of the Rule of 80 results in a non-recurring cost equal to the increase of the liabilities accrued with respect to prior service as the rule becomes applicable to all judges on the basis of their total service. The increase in the actuarial liability on the Unit Credit basis is estimated to $11.4 million on the basis of the 1991 year-end population. This estimate has been deemed an acceptable approximation for the increase on the Entry Age basis which could not be available within the required time period. The December 31, 1991, estimate covered 902 judges. It has been projected to April 1, 1992, in proportion to the increase in aggregate salaries for the population of 898 judges at that date.

This increase in liabilities can be amortized by equal annual installments over the Expected Average Remaining Service Lifetime of the judges, estimated at 12.0 years which result in a declining percentage cost over the 12-year period. The projected increase in liabilities is $ 12.0 millions and the annual installment is $ 1,626,000.

The cost increases are estimated as follows by comparison to total compensation costs as at 4/1/92 before change :

	Increase in accrued liability allocated to first year	Increase in accrued liability amortized over 12 years
4/1/93 - 3/31/94	16,488,502	6,114,502
4/1/94 - 3/31/95	4,488,502	6,114,502
4/1/95 - 3/31/96	9,160,959	10,786,959
Total	$ 30,137,963	$ 23,015,963

ACTUARIAL ASSUMPTIONS

This section describes the actuarial assumptions used by the Chief Actuary of the Office of the Superintendant of Financial Institutions for valuing the liabilities of the Pension Plan for Federally Appointed Judges in the 1992 Public Accounts.

A. Economic Assumptions as for 1992 Public Accounts

The valuations assumptions are set at the Yield minus 1%, but no less than the New Money rate. The Fund Yield is derived through an iterative process based on investments in notional 20-year bonds.

	Rates of Interest
Year	New Money %	Projected Fund Yield %	Valuation Assumption %	January 1 Pension Indexing %	Salary Increases %
1992	8.5	10.8	9.8	5.8	5.4
1993	8.3	10.7	9.7	2.1	0.0
1994	8.0	10.5	9.5	2.2	0.0
1995	7.6	10.4	9.4	2.1	2.5
1996	7.3	10.2	9.2	2.0	2.4
1997	6.9	10.0	9.0	1.9	2.3
1998	6.0	9.7	8.7	1.8	2.5
1999	5.0	9.4	8.4	2.0	2.5
2000	5.0	9.1	8.1	2.0	2.5
2001	5.0	8.7	7.7	2.0	2.5
2002	5.0	8.3	7.3	2.0	2.5
2003	5.0	7.9	6.9	2.0	2.5
2004	5.0	7.7	6.7	2.0	2.5
2005	5.0	7.8	6.4	2.0	2.5
2006	5.0	7.1	6.1	2.0	2.5
2007	5.0	6.9	5.9	2.0	2.5
2008	5.0	6.7	5.7	2.0	2.5
2009	5.0	6.5	5.5	2.0	2.5
2010	5.0	6.2	5.2	2.0	2.5
2015	5.0	5.2	5.0	2.0	2.5
Ultimate	5.0	5.0	5.0	2.0	2.5

B. Main Demographic Assumptions

The demographic assumptions are those expected to be used for the forthcoming statutory valuation as at December 31, 1991. In aggregate they are not materially different from the demographic assumptions used in the 1988 statutory valuation described more fully in the Actuarial Report signed by the Chief Actuary on June 20, 1990.

RETIREMENT RATES

Retirement rates are based on the smoothed experience of the plan. These unisex rates are applied only to active judges who qualify for pensionable retirement or must retire at age 75.

For those eligible under the Rule of 80, the statutory rates of retirement were extended down to age 60 and rates of retirement at ages 70 to 74 have been adjusted to reflect the 10-year limit on Supernumerary status as follows:

Age	Rate	Age	Rate
60	.0141	70	.9229
61	.0155	71	.5199
62	.0170	72	1.0000
63	.0187
64	.0206

NEW ENTRANTS FOR ENTRY AGE NORMAL COST

	Male	Female
Below 46	16%	82%
46 - 50	28%	10%
51 - 55	26%	8%
56 - 60	23%	0%
Over 60	7%	0%
Average Age	51.9	42.2

OTHER ASSUMPTIONS

Mortality rates for the year 1992 are based on the 1983 Group Annuity Mortality Table, adjusted to recognize the recent experience of the plan. Rates for 1993 and subsequent years are obtained by decreasing the 1992 rates by mortality improvement factors on the order of 1% per annum. For disability pensioners, levels of mortality are more than doubled. There are separate rates for males and females.

Disability rates are based on the smoothed experience of the plan. These unisex rates are applied only to active judges not yet eligible for pensionable retirement.

The sex-distinct proportion-married, age of surviving spouse, and surviving offspring assumptions are based largely on the plan's own experience and are applied to both active and retired plan members.

GLOSSARY

Actuarial Cost Method

A recognized technique for establishing the amount and incidence of the actuarial cost of pension or benefits programs, and the related actuarial liabilities.

Actuarial Present Value

The value of an amount or series of amounts payable or receivable at various times, determined as of a given date by the application of a particular set of actuarial assumptions.

Cost of Benefit Method

Total compensation valuation method that consists in comparing actual disbursements made by employers for employees, without any reference on the amount or quality of compensation being provided.

Entry Age Actuarial Cost Method

Also called entry age normal actuarial cost method. A method under which the actuarial present value of the projected benefits of each individual included in an actuarial valuation is allocated on a level basis over the earnings or service of the individual between entry age and assumed exit age(s). The portion of this actuarial present value allocated to a valuation year is called the normal cost. The portion of this actuarial present value not provided for at a valuation date by the actuarial present value of future normal costs is called the actuarial accrued liability. Under this method, the actuarial gains (losses) are reflected as they occur in a decrease (increase) in the unfunded actuarial accrued liability.

Expected Average Remaining Service Life (of an employee group)

Total number of years of future service expected to be rendered by that group divided by the number of employees in the group. The calculation of expected future service takes into account decrements based on actuarial assumptions but is not weighted by benefits or compensation.

Experience

Usually expressed as a ratio or percentage, it is the relationship of claims, or benefits of a plan over the expected amounts.

Funding Method

Any of the several techniques actuaries use in determining the amounts of contributions to provide for pension costs.

Gross Comparison Method

Total compensation valuation method that consists in assigning subjective values to each element of a compensation package and then comparing these values to values assigned to similar compensation elements offered to other employees.

Level of Benefit Method

Total compensation valuation method that involves calculating the costs incurred by the employer to provide its employees with a compensation package, current or simulated.

Simulated Cost Method

Different term used to refer to the level of benefit method.

Total Compensation

Includes all the conditions, contractual or statutory, which usually result in a financial commitment by the employer, in respect of employees or for their benefit, which the employer meets in exchange for the work performed for a given period.

Unit Credit Actuarial Cost Method

An actuarial cost method under which the plan's normal cost for a year is the present value of the benefit credited to all participants for service in that year and the accrued liability is the present value at the plan's inception of the units of benefits credited to participants for service before the plan's inception.

Report and Recommendations of the 1995 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits

Submitted to the Minister of Justice Canada

September 30, 1996

Pursuant to Section 26 of the Judges Act, I am now tabling the Report and Recommendations of the 1995 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits, appointed on September 30, 1995, to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally. In accordance with Standing Order 32(5) of the House of Commons, this document shall be deemed to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada

Allan Rock

I. Introduction

The undersigned were appointed pursuant to section 26 of the Judges Act, the Triennial Review Commission, to enquire into the salaries and benefits of Her Majesty's judges and to make recommendations to the Minister of Justice to be laid before Parliament in accordance with the statutory arrangement. We were appointed on the 6th day of October, 1995, and are the fifth such Commission since the institution was created in 1981.

Subsequent to our appointment, Bill C2 was introduced in Parliament extending the mandate of this and succeeding Commissions from 6 to 12 months. We were specifically invited at the time of our appointment to give particular consideration to problems associated with the process by which Triennial Commission Reports are received and ultimately tabled in Parliament and the extent to which the Constitutional responsibility of Parliament to fix and provide judicial salaries, allowances, and pensions is facilitated by the process. Our inquiry has confirmed that there is much legitimate cause for concern about the Triennial Review process and a very serious question as to whether it is, in practice, serving the system.

To the extent that the Triennial Commission's inquiry is intended to facilitate the discharge of Parliament's obligation pursuant to section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, there are germane and serious questions as to whether the process is functioning as intended. By the delivery of this Report, we invite the Government to address this aspect of the question as a matter of first priority in the interest of maintaining the integrity of the system for the future.

During the process of discharging our mandate and in the course of gathering the requisite information we have, not unexpectedly, been most impressed with the dignity and dedication of the members of the various courts who addressed us on their own behalf and on behalf of their colleagues. We are of the view that Canadians are well served by a committed, independent and impartial judiciary. In this respect, we enjoy the benefits of an extraordinary resource which must be nurtured and supported in our own collective interest and the interest of those who follow.

II. Summary of Recommendations

1. That section 26(3) of the Judges Act be amended to require that the Minister, after a fixed period of time (three months), shall cause the Report of the Triennial Commission to be tabled in the House of Commons, together with the Government's response to the Report and a Government Bill incorporating those matters requiring legislative change as part of the process of implementing the same; both the Response and the Bill to be filed within a fixed number of sitting days (30 days) after the expiry of the initial period noted above.

2. That commencing April 1, 1997, the Government introduce an appropriately phased upward adjustment in judicial salaries such as to ensure that the erosion of the salary base caused by the elimination of statutory indexing is effectively corrected.

3. That retirement at full pension be permitted when a judge has served on the Bench for a minimum of 15 years and the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80.

4. That, in addition to the existing retirement provisions and our recommendation concerning the Rule of 80, judges of the Supreme Court of Canada be permitted to retire with a full pension after serving a minimum of ten years on the Court.

5. That provision be made in the Judges Act for a surviving spouse's annuity to be paid, in legally appropriate circumstances, to a common-law spouse.

6. That provision be made in the Judges Act to enable a retired judge who marries after retirement to provide for joint and survivor benefits.

7. That section 51(4)(b) of the Judges Act be amended to provide that interest be payable upon the return of all pension contributions in respect of the 1996 contribution year, and each contribution year that is subsequent to 1996, calculated at the rates prescribed by the Income Tax Regulations, and compounded annually.

8. That the government paid life insurance coverage for judges be brought more closely into line with that provided to Deputy Ministers.

9. That section 54(1) of the Judges Act be amended to authorize Chief Justices to approve leaves of absence of up to six months, including maternity/parental leave and study leave.

III. The Review Process

A. INTRODUCTION

Section 26 of the Judges Act requires the Minister of Justice of Canada to appoint a Commission every third year "to inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Judges Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally." The Commissioners are required within twelve months of their appointment to submit a report to the Minister of Justice "containing such recommendations as they consider appropriate." The Minister is required by the Act to "cause the report to be laid before Parliament not later than the tenth sitting day of Parliament after the Minister receives it."

A reader of the past four Triennial Review Commission reports will note that the issue of process is the first item dealt with in every case. Successive Commissions have stressed that the process is flawed by reason of the failure of governments to act with reasonable dispatch to introduce and enact legislation in response to the recommendations of Triennial Commissions. Bill C-50, which died on the Order Paper, is the sole piece of legislation introduced in Parliament since the third Commission was held in 1989.

The Minister of Justice has recognized that there are serious problems with the present system. In an address to the Canadian Judicial Council in March 1994, he noted:

> "...I regard it as unacceptable that two triennial commission reports have been received and not yet acted upon, that Bill C-50 died on the Order Paper, and that a third triennial commission exercise will soon be upon us. I know, I can sense strongly, that things are reaching the point where the very legitimacy of the system itself is in question, where confidence of judges is being seriously undermined. But there are implications for the morale of judges, for frayed relations with Government, and it is made all the worse and all the more damaging because of the very few ways that judges have for speaking out. There is a perception that I know is growing that the system which was designed to be non-political and above the fray is not working. This is where I come in."

The Minister has specifically mandated this Commission through our terms of reference to include:

> "...recommendations for improvements to the process by which judicial compensation is established."

In his letter of August 1995 appointing each of us as Commissioners, he drew our attention to this specific responsibility:

> "As the attached terms of reference indicate, I would like the Commission to deal with the issue of the process for establishing judicial compensation and to recommend any changes that could improve the process."

What follows is our response to this aspect of our mandate.

B. THE PROCESS AND ITS REFORM

It has been repeatedly noted by past Triennial Review Commissions, and by students of the subject, that the matter of establishing judicial remuneration in a parliamentary democracy has much to do with the separation of powers in general, and the independence of the judiciary, in particular. Western democracies rooted in English constitutional tradition have been at pains to ensure that judicial independence, which ensures accountability on the part of the executive branch of Government, is uncontaminated by uncertainty (and thus preoccupation) on the part of the judges with their economic security. Under our Constitution the obligation is upon Parliament to "fix and provide" the salaries and benefits of judges. It is implicit in this constitutional imperative that the process be undertaken in an environment in which judicial independence is enhanced and the consequences of dependency eliminated.

Each parliamentary democracy has its own method of achieving these goals. In Canada, prior to the establishment of the Triennial Review Commission, the process was both unstructured and unsatisfactory. It was characterized by the judiciary, in a supplicant's role, petitioning the Government through the responsible minister, usually with the support of related institutions in the judicial process, including the Bar, urging the Government to petition Parliament to do what was necessary to fulfil its constitutional obligation with respect to economic security for the judges. The imperfections in the system, largely dictated by dependence upon the commitment and goodwill of the Minister gave rise, in 1981, to the passage of section 26 of the Judges Act establishing the institution of the Triennial Review Commission.

The purpose of the Commission was to ensure that, through the creation of a body which would be independent both of the judiciary and Government, Parliament would be presented with an objective and fair set of recommendations dictated by the public interest, having the effect of maintaining the independence of the judiciary while at the same time attracting those preeminently suited for judicial office. The theory was that, by way of such recommendations, emanating from regularly convened independent commissions, the process would be de-politicized and judicial independence would be thus maintained.

While the idea was sound, the underlying assumptions appear to have been naïve. The result has been a failure in practice to meet the desired objectives. Since the first Triennial, there have been four Commissions (Lang (1983), Guthrie (1986), Courtois (1989) and Crawford (1992)). In spite of extensive inquiries and exhaustive research in each case, recommendations as to the establishment of judicial salaries and other benefits have fallen almost totally upon deaf ears. The reasons for this state of affairs have been largely political.

Prior to the establishment of the present process, the dictates of section 100 of the Constitution Act have required successive Ministers, on a regular basis, to ensure that Governments discharge their constitutional responsibilities. Success has frequently been mixed. An unanticipated and unintended result of the establishment of the present Triennial process has been the insulation of Ministers from the otherwise pressing requirements of the Constitution with respect to salaries and benefits. Upon delivery of successive reports, political debate in Committee has followed with governments behaving as though, "having caused the Report to be laid before Parliament," they were thereby absolved from their constitutional responsibilities. This situation represents not only an unexpected, but a highly undesirable, result of the establishment of the Triennial Review Commission model. What was seen as a positive step has in many ways proved to have been negative. In spite of thorough recommendations by successive Commissions, Parliament has failed, in a proactive sense, to fix judicial salaries and benefits for many years. Furthermore, successive reports have failed to generate any meaningful response from Government. The whole subject of judicial salaries and benefits has, in spite of the best intentions, been politicized. The present Commission has detected in its hearings and consultations a very definite impact on judicial morale caused almost entirely by the fruitlessness of the present process.

When the Act was amended to establish Triennial Review Commissions in 1981, judicial expectations were elevated, in large measure, by prognostications on the part of Government as to improvements in judicial affairs which would flow from the creation of an independent Commission. The then-Minister of Justice noted:

> "But there comes a time when the inaction on the salaries of judges in inflationary period begins to have profound effects, not only on the morale of those sitting on the Bench but also on the attractiveness of judicial appointment to the more highly qualified lawyers who we would like to see appointed to the Bench. At some stage, subtly and slowly, no doubt, a failure to maintain judicial compensation in line to some degree with inflationary tendencies must come to affect the quality of our judiciary. I have no doubt about the correctness of that proposition and I venture to suggest that there is a real concern about judicial compensation that underlies section 100 of the *British North America Act.
> That section, which deals with the provision of salaries, allowances and pensions of the federally appointed judiciary, is unique. It is the sole section of the B.N.A. Act which casts an affirmative obligation on Parliament to enact legislation. In recent economic circumstances, this obligation serves to secure not only the independence of the judiciary, but also requires Parliament to take action to mitigate the debilitating effects on the judiciary that flow from undue delay or default in securing legislation on judicial compensation. Bill C-34 seeks to fulfil that constitutional responsibility and to improve the structure of compensation for the > federally appointed judiciary.

> ...The Bill provides for the appointment of a commission made up of no more than five members which will be asked to examine every three years the adequacy of judicial compensation." [emphasis added]

In effect, what judicial appointees since 1981 were promised by the establishment of the Triennial Commission was an independent, rational, depoliticized procedure for the determination of their compensation. The perception abounds that what they got was an abdication by the Government of its constitutional responsibilities. Furthermore, the ramifications of the failure to fulfil this promise will be significant and detrimental if the shortcomings in the process are not soon rectified.

The problem is not simply that the report of the Triennial Review Commission is laid before Parliament as the Judges Act requires but that the Government has, by the process of referral, excused itself from responding to its recommendations in the clear and nonpartisan way that was promised. One could argue that the establishment of the Commission has created an imperative obligation on the Government to consider Commission reports and make recommendations to Parliament thereupon, apart altogether from the adoption of any of the specific recommendations contained in the report. Continued indifference on the part of Governments (and through such Governments successive Parliaments) to recommendations made by Review Commissions has undermined the system and the expectations which accompanied its creation in 1981. Not only has inaction on the part of the Government disheartened the judges, but of greater concern is the fact that it will undoubtedly have a negative effect, over the course of time, upon candidates for the judiciary best suited for judicial appointment, candidates who are required almost inevitably to make significant economic sacrifice in order to accept appointment. Judicial despondency, interestingly, is not attributable so much to Parliament's failure to accept the recommendations of successive Commissions as it is to the Government's failure to react to such recommendations in advance of general debate or, indeed, at all. Regrettably, it would appear, the appointment of successive Commissions has simply served to distance the Government from the performance of its obligations when it was thought that it would ensure a prompt and practical response to Parliament's constitutional obligations.

If evidence of the failure of the present system were required, it would come directly from the history of the work of successive Commissions. In each case, Triennial Review Commissions have made recommendations for change in the process to overcome the same obstacles identified in this report. In every case, the recommendations for change have equally fallen upon deaf ears. The utterances of successive Commissions have become like trees falling in the forest. The Lang Commission (1983) recommended a negative resolution solution such as exists in several Australian states. The Guthrie Commission (1986) recommended mechanisms to ensure prompt adoption of acceptable recommendations by the Government. The Courtois Commission (1989) proposed setting a time limit within which Government ought to respond. The Crawford Commission (1992) recommended obliging the Government to introduce legislation within a specific time frame as a reaction to the Commission's recommendations. The fact that none of these were accepted, nor even commented upon by Government, is compelling evidence of institutional indifference to the statutory process and its shortcomings.

Your Commissioners make their own recommendations hereunder with respect to procedural and structural changes designed to convert the Triennial Review process from a peculiar anomaly to a practical instrument for change as was originally intended. Failing change, this section of the Report is intended to forewarn our successors that by their appointment they will become instruments in a process which, far from ensuring an independent and positive response to constitutional obligations, will, in all probability, have the opposite effect.

Presently, after the report is laid before Parliament by the Minister of Justice, it is referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which conducts its own review of Commission recommendations prior to the Government formulating its position. The consequences of this are that a process that was designed to be "depoliticized" is not. The Government, upon receipt of the Standing Committee's report on judicial salaries and benefits, is left in an awkward situation when inclined to take a different view. This in turn has a negative impact on the prospect of the introduction of any constructive legislation. In order to overcome this situation, we have concluded that the Judges Act should be amended to require that within a fixed time frame, consideration by Parliament of the Commission's report should coincide with the introduction of a government bill incorporating desired changes to the salaries and benefits of the judges. We are advised that this proposal can be accommodated within the existing standing orders of the House of Commons (ref. Standing Order 32(5)). If a regime along these lines were created, the public in general, and the judiciary in particular, could be confident that Commission recommendations would be responded to by Government and those recommendations considered desirable, of which there are surely many examples in the past, would thereby, and promptly, be the subject of legislative change.

Your Commission has also considered the possibility of recommending even more substantive change. Several suggestions emerged during the Commission's inquiry process. That most frequently repeated was the adoption of the so-called "negative resolution regime" which has been adopted in certain jurisdictions, notably by the Government of New South Wales. Under this regime, the Commission's recommendations would be by statute considered binding upon Government and, through Government, Parliament unless Parliament adopted a form of "negative resolution" within a specified period of time. This approach has substantial appeal in that it appears to resolve the irksome issue of failure on the part of Governments and Parliaments to act on the recommendations of successive Commissions. On the other hand, there is a down side in the form of a risk that if a negative resolution process were adopted, reports of future Triennial Commissions might well, by the passage of a negative resolution, be discarded in their entirety. In the final analysis, and while the negative resolution approach has much to recommend it, it is the impression of your Commission that it is not likely that this model would be considered seriously by the Government. Accordingly, we confine ourselves to the more modest proposal outlined above.

If these or similar corrective measures are not introduced, the statutory scheme will collapse of its own weight with the attendant damage to the institution of the judiciary which can be expected to occur.

It is therefore recommended that: section 26(3) of the Judges Act be amended to require that the Minister, after a fixed period of time (three months), shall cause the Report of the Triennial Commission to be tabled in the House of Commons, together with the Government's response to the Report and a Government Bill incorporating those matters requiring legislative change as part of the process of implementing the same; both the Response and the Bill to be filed within a fixed number of sitting days (30 days) after the expiry of the initial period noted above.

IV. Judicial Salaries

The independence of the judiciary, the attractions of the Bench for highly qualified and experienced men and women, financial security and the preservation of the enviable standards of our Courts are all important features of the judicial component of our system of administration of justice in Canada. The Constitution Act, 1867, confers on Parliament the duty to fix and provide judicial salaries, allowances and pensions. The Judges Act prescribes the Triennial Commission review process, the statutory annual salary adjustment plans and, pursuant to Part I, the administration of the Act by the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs. A properly functioning system requires a high level of synergy between these inter-dependent elements.

As a result of amendments to the Judges Act in 1975, the salary level of superior court puisne judges was brought to within 2% of the mid-point of the salary range of the most senior level (DM-3) of federal deputy ministers. As the Guthrie (Commission 1986) reported:

> "In 1975, judicial salary equivalence to senior deputy ministers was generally regarded, however, as satisfying all of the criteria to be considered in determining judicial salaries. At that level, a sufficient degree of financial security was assured and there were few financial impediments to recruiting well-qualified lawyers for appointment to the bench."

At the present time the salaries of superior court puisne judges are $155,800 while the mid-point of the DM-3 salary range is $155,300 (there are currently nine deputy ministers at the DM-3 level which is the most senior level of federal public servant).

Triennial Commissions subsequent to the 1975 amendments to the Judges Act have endorsed this measure of equivalence, not as a precise measure of "value," but as one that appeared to them to:

> "...reflect(s) what the market place expects to pay individuals of outstanding character and ability, which are attributes shared by deputy ministers and judges."

The Courtois Commission Report (1989)

Or, as stated in the Crawford Commission Report (1992):

> "Rough parity of this nature between judges and top-level public servants finds support in the comparative salary figures from a number of other common law industrial democracies."
> The Crawford Commission Report (1992)

A strong case can be made for the proposition that the comparison between DM-3's and judges' compensation is both imprecise and inappropriate. The Canadian Judicial Council and the Canadian Judges' Conference made extensive submissions in this connection. Your Commissioners choose not to focus on this aspect of the matter, but rather to address a far more significant aspect of judicial compensation, specifically the relationship between judicial income and income at the private Bar from which candidates for judicial office are largely drawn.

Section 25 of the Judges Act provides a statutory mechanism for the annual adjustment of judges salaries whereby they may be increased in accordance with the "Industrial Aggregate Index formula" to a maximum of 7%. However, salaries have been frozen since December 1992 and will remain so until March 31, 1997 as reflected in the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act.

The provisions of s.25 of the Judges Act are reflective of much more than a mere indexing of judges' salaries. They are, more specifically, a statutory mechanism for ensuring that there will be, to the extent possible, a constant relationship, in terms of degree, between judges' salaries and the incomes of those members of the Bar most suited in experience and ability for appointment to the Bench. The importance of the maintenance of this constant cannot be overstated. It represents, in effect, a social contract between the state and the judiciary. By its statutory terms, the judges, who by acceptance of judicial office close the door, on a permanent basis, to any real prospect of a return to their previous lives at the Bar, can at least be certain that their commitment in accepting a judicial appointment will not result over the years in a less favourable financial situation as between judicial service and practice at the Bar than that which prevailed at the moment of their appointment.

Seen in this light, the freezing of salaries, which has had the effect of neutralizing the operation of s.25 of the Judges Act, has, in the absence of corrective action, permanently altered the relationship described above. When the freeze is lifted, the section will have been inoperative for five years.

The judges in the Joint Brief noted, at page 39:

> "It is accepted that as an aspect of judicial independence, judges must be financially secure. This can only be achieved if both the executive and legislative branches of Government respect the integrity of the provision of the Judges Act. It is indeed to be remembered that those provisions dealing with statutory indexation constituted an important part of the terms and conditions of appointment. It may be said that many judges would have refused an appointment to the Bench, had it not been for the security provided by the statutory indexation."

Your Commission agrees with this submission.

What are the effects of the salary freeze? Over the four year period to April 1996, one year prior to the end of the freeze, judicial salaries, absent indexation, have been reduced by approximately 8%[1]. Furthermore, by reason of the failure of governments to introduce 1975 equivalency, notwithstanding recommendations of successive Triennial Commissions, judicial salaries have been further eroded. In terms of the clear intent to establish a to April 1, 1993	3.4% relationship between Bench and Bar, or even a relationship with DM-3's, the judiciary is in an accelerating backward slide. This has serious and troubling implications for the long term attraction of suitable candidates for office. Indeed, the removal of indexing has resulted in the anomalous situation in which judges retiring prior to the freeze in 1992 are enjoying a significantly higher annuity than that which can be expected for those who retire tomorrow.

Accordingly, your Commission, rather than engaging in an elaborate analysis of DM-3's and their comparability with judges, or indeed the available statistics with respect to earnings of candidates in the private sector at the Bar, chooses to focus on the most significant factor, the withdrawal of indexing. It is this government initiative which has been, and if not checked will continue to be, the most significant contributor to distancing judicial salaries from those of the practising Bar. Corrective action is clearly called for.

It is recommended that: commencing April 1, 1997, the Government introduce an appropriately phased upward adjustment in judicial salaries such as to ensure that the erosion of the salary base caused by the elimination of statutory indexing is effectively corrected.

V. Judicial Annuities

A. Rule of 80

There can be no doubt that the time has come for the Government to consider the need for some more contemporary form of retirement option for judges, such as the Rule of 80, the adoption of which is recommended in this report. This subject enjoys the highest priority in the view of the judiciary. Informed observers, including responsible members of the Bar, are unanimous in the view that the ability of ordinary mortals to function in the judicial mode is finite in terms of time. The judge's role is a unique one, as is the case with all fact-finders and dispute-resolvers. Their task, which is to sit, to listen and to decide, while sometimes appearing unremarkable, requires mental discipline of a kind which in most human beings has its limitations. Where the requisite mental discipline is lacking or exhausted, the result is, or can be, a tendency to undermine, in a serious way, public acceptance of judicial decision making in individual cases. Furthermore, in a changing world, there is a constant need for rejuvenation of the Bench by younger persons expressive of current views. Renewal must be systemic so as to ensure that the profile of the Bench is expressive of contemporary societal values. The result is, as has been recognized by successive Governments, that the appointments process can no longer be seen as a mere matter of finding suitable candidates for office who are at the end of their careers.

There is also the important question of gender balance. Your Commissioners were offered very strong representations on this subject from women judges, many of whom have been appointed at much younger ages. Under the present system, by reason of their age at appointment, they are being required to continue in office for what may, in some cases, be unacceptably lengthy periods of time before retirement. The notion, implicit in the present Act, that a period of 15 years service represents an appropriate judicial lifespan may be inapplicable for many women judges who are appointed at younger ages. We were provided with statistics which would suggest that well over 80% of women judges presently sitting were appointed before age 50 and almost 25% before age 40. It is a matter of real concern on the part of many women judges and, no doubt, candidates for judicial office, that unreasonably long periods of service may be required before retirement with any pension is possible. This concern may seriously affect the already difficult task of attracting qualified women candidates from a pool whose numbers have yet to grow to that of male lawyers. Gender and age ranges have already broadened but the terms of the annuity are focused largely at males appointed to the Bench at or after age 50.

The Crawford Commission (1992) described the Rule of 80 retirement option:

> "...as particularly appropriate in view of the changing age profile of judges. By permitting retirement with a full pension at earlier ages, in a flexible and fair manner which recognizes the unique service conditions and requirements of the judiciary, the Rule of 80 would not be inconsistent with pension reform standards."

Early retirement plans are increasingly common in society. In many ways they are even more defensible in the case of the judiciary. As noted above, such plans could contribute to the overall quality and efficiency of the Bench by affording long-serving judges, who may be suffering from "burn-out," the opportunity to retire at a time when their judicial energy may have been sapped, thereby opening the way for renewal with younger, more representative judges many of whom will, logically, be women.

It should also be noted that judicial responsibilities are not amenable to constructive change during a judge's tenure on the Bench. The institution affords no opportunity to assume an alternative role as a basis for maintaining one's usefulness such as is the case in almost all other institutional and business settings.

Furthermore, as pointed out elsewhere, a serious concern which was raised before the Crawford Commission was the impact of the changes in the RRSP arrangements disentitling the judiciary to plan for retirement by investments in RRSPs. In particular, women members of the Bench who are generally appointed at a younger age, make the point that during their most productive years, and as young judges, they are no longer able to contribute to RRSPs even though they cannot be certain that they will be able to continue to occupy the Bench to age 65. The present regime deprives them of the opportunity to make arrangements to forestall disaster in the event of premature retirement. It is argued, with some force, that the decision on the part of the Government to withdraw the right to invest in RRSPs was, in all probability, made without consideration of the impact on younger, and in most cases, female appointees.

No data was presented in the Crawford Commission report (1992) to illustrate the magnitude of this "loss." In their submission to the present Commission, the judges presented a report from William M. Mercer Limited, a consulting actuarial firm (tabled with the Commission on May 15, 1996), which provided estimates of this loss. Prior to 1992, judges could contribute to a personal RRSP in the maximum allowable amount, but are now restricted to a $1,000 annual maximum. The differences in tax savings and investment accumulations taken together or separately over a 30 year period were obviously quite staggering whatever actuarial assumptions are utilized. Mercers estimated that the difference in accumulation over 30 years before tax was in the amount of $1.7 million but the loss due to the elimination of tax benefits on an after tax basis was in the neighbourhood of $437,000.

We have sympathy with these concerns, nonetheless, we are of the view that if the Government reacts rapidly and introduces the Rule of 80, much of the negative impact of the RRSP changes, particularly on younger judges, will be minimized.

These are some of the reasons why modified criteria for retirement, in general, and the Rule of 80 in particular, have been considered and offered broad support for a number of years. In assessing the Rule of 80 itself and how it might be implemented, it was noted that various formulae might be utilized to achieve the combination of years of service and age totalling 80. The judges, and the Canadian Bar Association, in their submissions argued that the Rule of 80 should not be encumbered by a minimum age or service requirement. Others argue that a judge should be required to serve a minimum of 15 years on the Bench in order to qualify for retirement under the Rule of 80. This would be consistent with the prescribed minimum of 15 years of service for retirement at age 65 pursuant to section 42 of the Judges Act.

Interestingly, present incumbents who are somewhat older and largely male would argue that an unencumbered Rule of 80 is desirable in order to ensure that judges who are appointed after age 50 can retire at age 65. Women judges, on the other hand, and in particular younger women, have argued that shorter minimum periods than the traditional 15 years in the present legislation ought to be considered having in mind the situation confronted by women who are appointed in the early years of their careers. It has been argued on behalf of younger women judges that fairness is better served with more weighting for length of service and less for age.

There have been extensive discussions with successive Ministers and other interested groups with respect to the Rule of 80 and support for its adoption is virtually universal. In addition, studies have been conducted by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions Canada. It has been concluded that the cost associated with the introduction of this scheme would be negligible. More specifically, it was noted that:

> "...the increase in the pension plan's accrued liability and normal cost caused by the Rule of 80 would in practice be almost entirely offset by the payroll decrease arising from the removal of partially-productive judges from the bench."
> Correspondence from L.M. Cornelis (OSFIC) to H. Sandell (Department of Justice) dated June 16, 1995

We are of the view that on balance a Rule of 80 with a 15 year period of service best meets the requirements of the public interest in the present profile and state of maturity of the Bench. For most younger women, a 15 year minimum will still enable those who have reached their limit of useful service to retire at an appropriate age.

The adoption of this reform was eloquently defended and recommended in the Crawford

Report. We cannot but believe that the failure of the Government to implement this constructive recommendation was more likely due to process deficiencies referred to elsewhere in this report than to substantive reservations or objections.

It is recommended that: retirement at full pension be permitted when a judge has served on the Bench for a minimum of 15 years and the sum of age and years of service equals at least 80.

B. PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS BY JUDGES WHO ARE ELIGIBLE TO RETIRE ON FULL PENSION

Section 42 of the Judges Act provides for the granting of an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office of a judge. Judges are eligible to proceed to pension at age 65 if they have accumulated 15 years service. The majority (about 75%) do not retire but opt to continue as supernumerary judges at full pay until they leave office either before or at the mandatory retirement age of 75. All judges are expected to make pension contributions at the rate of 7% of salary until they take their retirement.

The requirement to continue pension contributions after eligibility for retirement is the source of much disquiet on the part of the judiciary. The Conference and the Council consider this requirement a levy for which there is no corresponding benefit; inconsistent with other pension plans which provide for discontinuance of contributions when pensions are paid up and actuarially inappropriate in requiring continued contributions beyond the age of eligibility for retirement. Essentially it is argued that contributions beyond retirement entitlement provide no corresponding benefit.

It is important to remember in weighing these considerations that there is a marked difference between the pension scheme for public servants and the annuity for the judiciary. The pension of a judge is two-thirds of the final years' salary following 15 years service. On the other hand, a career public servant must accumulate 35 years of pensionable service and reach the age of 55 in order to receive the maximum pension. Quantum is based on 70% of the individual's average salary for the best six consecutive years. A Deputy Minister who qualifies as a career public servant is entitled to an additional 2% pension income per year for each year served as a Deputy Minister to a maximum of ten years. Differences between pension and annuities are important.

Information derived from the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions Canada in December 1995 demonstrates that the sum of the annual pension contributions of 7% made by judges to retirement are modest relative to the final costs borne by the Crown. For example, the cost to provide an annuity to a judge at age 75 with 20 years of service would require an annual contribution by the state of 36.9% of his or her salary. Based upon the judge's contributions of 7%, it follows that the Crown bears the remainder of the burden which, in this example, would be 29.9%. This is illustrative of the distinction between an annuity and a funded pension.

We therefore agree with the conclusions of the Crawford Commission (1992) which supported the continuation of judges' contributions toward the cost of their pensions until those who are entitled to retire, do so. Any perception of inequitable treatment is surely tempered by the benefits afforded the annuitant under the present arrangement.

C. Retirement for Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada

Successive Triennial Commissions have all recommended a special regime for the retirement of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Notwithstanding the retirement regime which we are recommending by the adoption of the Rule of 80, we are also persuaded that judges of the Supreme Court of Canada ought to be permitted to retire with full annuity after 10 years service.

Judicial service on the Supreme Court of Canada, is of course, unique, not so much in terms of the prestige associated with the office, as with the depth of responsibility and onerous workload which is peculiar to the Court of last resort in our system. Review of cases emanating from the highest appellate courts in the provinces and the Federal Court of Appeal is an enormous burden. The criteria for leave to appeal to the Court defines this responsibility. Only those cases involving issues of national importance reach the Court, thus each case that the members of the Court consider is a matter of special significance. There are no routine matters on the Court's calendar.

It is well to reflect on the capacity of individuals, other than the most extraordinary, to cope with the relentless intellectual self-discipline associated with the work of the Court. There are surely limits as to the capacity of the judges to maintain the requisite focus over many years. Furthermore, the responsibilities associated with the Charter militate in favour of an atmosphere of renewal on the Court. All of these circumstances lead to the conclusion that, insofar as the Supreme Court is concerned, in particular circumstances, 10 years of service may be all that can reasonably be expected. Thus, this period ought to represent the threshold for retirement. Flexibility at this level is clearly in the public interest.

It is recommended that: in addition to the existing retirement provisions and our recommendation concerning the Rule of 80, judges of the Supreme Court of Canada be permitted to retire with a full pension after serving a minimum of ten years on the Court.

D. SPOUSAL SURVIVOR BENEFITS

Pursuant to section 44 of the Judges Act, the surviving spouse of a deceased judge is provided with an annuity equal to one-third of the judge's salary and the surviving spouse of a retired judge, who was in receipt of an annuity at the time of death, is provided with an annuity equal to half of the amount of the retired judge's annuity. These annuities are indexed pursuant to the provisions of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

There has been a long-standing effort on the part of the judiciary to have each of these annuities increased to 40% and 60% respectively. These higher values, it is argued, would better reflect present federal, provincial, and many private sector pension benefits. However, judges' annuities, unlike the provisions of other pension plans, are based on the salary for the last year in office and not on the average salary for the best six years of employment. There are many features of the benefits currently in place which are equal to, if not better than, those afforded most others.

We are advised that the cost to implement this reform would be in the neighbourhood of $2 million over five years escalating accordingly thereafter. Changes along these lines have been recommended by previous Triennial Commissions. We consider that while these increases may be warranted, the reestablishment of an appropriate salary base for the judiciary is of greater importance. If priorities are being set, we would locate the reestablishment of this salary base of the highest level of importance and, accordingly, for the present, would recommend that there be no change in spousal survivor benefits.

E. COMMON-LAW SPOUSES

Section 44 of the Judges Act does not currently contemplate that the surviving spouse's annuity will be paid to common-law spouses. This is no longer a reflection of contemporary values. Furthermore, this deficiency is inconsistent with most provincial family law regimes. In addition, we have been advised that it is inconsistent with public sector policy. Reform is clearly indicated. Presumably, statutory change would be no more elaborate than definitional amendment to include a common-law spouse in the definition of spouse in the Act with entitlement to be dictated by conventional family law principles.

It is recommended that: provision be made in the Judges Act for a surviving spouse's annuity to be paid, in legally appropriate circumstances, to a common-law spouse.

F. JOINT AND SURVIVOR PENSIONS

There is currently no provision in the Judges Act to allow a retired judge who marries after retirement to elect to have his or her annuity paid on a joint-and-survivor basis. Again, this is an issue about which there is no contention from any quarter. Statutory reform is clearly indicated.

It is recommended that: provision be made in the Judges Act to enable a retired judge who marries after retirement to provide for joint and survivor benefits.

G. INTEREST ON JUDGES' PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS

Pursuant to section 51 of the Judges Act and section 6 of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, under certain conditions a judge's contributions toward his or her pension (annuity) may be returned to the judge upon retirement from the Bench where payment of the annuity is not otherwise triggered. In the event interest is payable, it is presently calculated at the rate of 4% compounded annually. This is the rate applicable under the circumstances for the return of pension contributions for all federal public servants.

Your Commissioners fail to appreciate the logic in utilizing a fixed rate of interest when calculating the amount of money to be returned to an individual who has made contributions to a pension plan and is about to withdraw those contributions. As the judges pointed out, this arrangement is "manifestly inequitable." Both the Guthrie Commission (1986) and the Courtois Commission (1989) recommended the adoption of "...a rate to be varied as and when necessary to reflect the 'prescribed rates'." The Government of the day recognized the necessity for this reform by including in Bill C-50 a provision which would have amended section 51 of the Judges Act to allow for a rate "prescribed by the Income Tax Regulations." This method of dealing with the anomaly in question is fair and appropriate and we would recommend its adoption.

It is therefore recommended that: section 51(4)(b) of the Judges Act be amended to provide that interest be payable upon the return of all pension contributions in respect of the 1996 contribution year, and each contribution year that is subsequent to 1996, calculated at the rates prescribed by the Income Tax Regulations, and compounded annually.

VI. Insurance

This is a non-statutory benefit. Federally appointed judges are covered for life insurance under the Public Service Management Insurance Plan in contrast to Deputy Ministers who are covered by what is described as an "Executive" plan. Essentially, Deputy Ministers receive basic coverage at twice their salaries, while judges only qualify for insurance equal to one- times their salaries. Supplementary insurance coverage at the individual's cost and at one-times salary is available to both groups.

It is the position of the judiciary that they should have equivalent insurance coverage, particularly if the utilization of Deputy Ministers as the comparable group for judges is to continue. If the judges were afforded equivalency of coverage, they would have coverage at two times salary in the form of group term life insurance with coverage to continue until retirement without reduction. Furthermore, the judiciary argues that this enhanced coverage is of even greater importance bearing in mind the removal of the right to make full RRSP contributions, in addition to what are described as the "relatively low" survivor benefits under the Judges Act.

These suggestions have much to recommend them. Economics aside, there is no reason why judges should be treated less favourably than the comparator group in question. We are advised that government officials have recognized this disparity and that a great deal of work has been undertaken to ascertain what might be done to address this situation. One of the difficulties is that the age profile of the judges is so vastly different from that of the five thousand or so senior public servants who are covered by the "Executive" plan, that it is, in the first place, not possible to incorporate them into this group, and in the second, a very expensive proposition to create an independent plan to provide like coverage. For example, because of the age profile of senior public servants, insurance for Deputy Ministers costs approximately 25 cents per month per $1000 units of insurance coverage. By reason of their present age profile, comparable insurance for the judges is estimated to be about four times as costly. However, implementation of the Rule of 80 and gender balancing will both serve to normalize the age of active judges over a relatively short time period.

Notwithstanding these cost considerations, it is clearly inequitable to continue in the present mode indefinitely. It is premature to make a detailed recommendation presently, but we are of the view that even if it must be a staged program based on manageable age criteria, efforts should be made to offer equivalent life insurance coverage for the judiciary.

It is recommended that: the government paid life insurance coverage for judges be brought more closely into line with that provided to Deputy Ministers.

VII. Leaves of Absence

Under section 54 of the Judges Act, leaves of absence in excess of 30 days require the approval of the Governor in Council. The Crawford Commission (1992) recommended that in every Superior or Appellate Court the Chief Justice be permitted to grant maternity or parental leave of up to six months. This is essentially a "management" issue and delegation of authority ought to have occurred long before this. There also appears to be an opportunity to broaden the scope of the study leave program and this we would encourage.

It is recommended that: section 54(1) of the Judges Act be amended to authorize Chief Justices to approve leaves of absence of up to six months, including maternity/parental leave and study leave.

VIII. Salary Differential Between Trial and Appellate Judges

As our report was in the final stages of preparation, a submission was received from the judges of the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec. In substance, the members of the Court urged the Commission to recommend that the existing system of remuneration for judges be fundamentally altered by striking salaries which would differentiate between those federally appointed judges who sit on Provincial Courts of Appeal and those who sit in the Trial Divisions. Higher pay for appellate judges, lower for trial judges. We are firmly of the view that the submission comes too late in the day for this Triennial Commission to address it. The notion of differential salaries requires very careful assessment. While some interesting points, in substance, in favour of the concept are advanced, a very persuasive case would have to be made to depart from the present regime which assumes that the burden of judicial office, while different in nature as between the trial and appellate levels of our courts, nonetheless requires an equivalent discipline and dedication on the part of the judges at both court levels. The cultural impact on the system in the event of such differentiation would have to be very carefully weighed. The submission, while welcome, simply came too late to be given the attention that this subject deserves.

IX. Conclusion

As has been noted by a succession of our predecessors, the Triennial Commission review process was instituted by Parliament to reduce the presence of political partisanship in the course of determining judicial salaries and benefits. To date, the process has been a failure. Your Commissioners are of the view that the principal reasons for this state of affairs are outlined in this Report. There is an opportunity, nonetheless, to rescue the statutory scheme and to restore it to the stature originally envisioned. The public interest in the effective administration of justice would be well served by modest, but meaningful, reform to achieve this objective.

All of which is respectfully submitted this 30th day of September 1996.

Background

1. Members: Mr. David W. Scott, Q.C. (Chairperson)
Ms. Barbara Rae, Order of Canada
Maitre Michel Vennat, Q.C., c.r., Order of Canada

Executive Secretary: Charles G. Watt

2. Terms of Reference

The Commission shall, pursuant to s.26 of the Judges Act, inquire into the adequacy of the salaries and other amounts payable under the Act and into the adequacy of judges' benefits generally.

The Commission shall report to the Minister of Justice within six months of the Commission's appointment, with such recommendations as the commission considers appropriate, including recommendations for improvements to the process by which judicial compensation is established.

The same Commissioners will make a second report to the Minister by November 30, 1996, recommending specific changes that should be made when economic circumstances allow. The report would be given by the Minister to the Canadian Judicial Council and the Canadian Judges Conference, and made public.

In carrying out its mandate, the Commissioners should:

1. Take into account:
   - (a) the principle of judicial independence, and in particular the constitutional requirement of financial security for judges
   - (b) the overall economic and fiscal situation, including the compensation freeze reflected in the *Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act
   - (c) comparative factors, including the relative compensation of judges in other jurisdictions, lawyers, persons paid out of public funds, and Canadians generally
   - (d) the need to attract strong candidates for judicial appointment.

2. Seek the views of judges and judicial organizations, the legal profession, and the Canadian public.

NOTE: The mandate of the 1995 Commission was formally extended to September 30, 1996 with the enactment of Bill C-2 in March 1996. Subsection 26 (2) of the Judges Act was amended to provide that the report of this and all future Commissions shall be submitted to the Minister within 12 months of their appointment.

3. Meetings and Conference Calls

The Commission held meetings and/or telephone conference calls as follows:

December 6, 1995 – Toronto
January 10, 1996 – Ottawa
January 26, 1996 – telephone conference
February 12, 1996 – Toronto
May 15, 1996 – Ottawa
June 27, 1996 – Toronto
July 20, 1996 – telephone conference
August 13, 1996 – Calgary
September 5, 1996 – Toronto

4. Notice to the Public

The Commission published a Notice in newspapers across Canada, inviting written submissions and presentations at an oral hearing, in either official language, concerning matters within the Commission's terms of reference. Specific notices were also sent to a number of interested organizations and individuals, including all of the provincial and territorial Ministers of Justice and Attorneys General. Copies of the Notice in English and French and a listing of the newspapers in which they were placed are reproduced at annex "A" to this Appendix.

5. Written Submissions and Public Hearing

Written submissions were received from the organizations, groups and individuals listed in Appendix "B". A public hearing took place on January 11, 1996, in Hearing Room Three, of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, 333 Laurier Avenue West, Ottawa. The following organizations appeared before the Commission:

- the Canadian Judges' Conference and the Canadian Judicial Council[2]; and
- the Canadian Bar Association[3]

The Commission held two other meetings with delegates from the Conference and Council; Mr. Andy Watt of the Department of Justice also attended. These meetings were held in Ottawa and Toronto on May 15, and June 27, 1996 respectively. Additionally, the Commissioners met with Chief Justice C.A. Fraser and a group of women judges in Alberta on August 13, 1996.

6. Previous Committees and Commissions

The 1995 Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits is the eighth federal committee or commission established in recent years to inquire into and make recommendations to the Minister of Justice with respect to judicial compensation. It is the fifth Triennial Commission appointed pursuant to subsection 26(1) of the Judges Act.

For the Conference and Council: The Hon.Mr. Justice Guy Kroft, Chief Justice Constance Glube, The Hon. Mr. Justice Coulter Osborne, The Hon. Mr. Justice Douglas Lambert, The Hon. Madam Justice Susan Lang, L'hon.juge André Brossard, The Hon. Mr. Justice Stuart Leggatt and Chief Judge Jean-Claude Couture

For the Canadian Bar Association: Mr. Ronald Pink, Q.C., and Ms. Joan Berkovitch

7. Acknowledgments

The Commission wishes to thank Guy Goulard, Q.C., Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs (Ottawa), and members of his staff, in particular Denis Guay, Joan Lamoureux, Marie Burgher, and the Finance Office for their cooperation and support. We also thank Andy Watt, Senior General Counsel and Harold Sandell, Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice; L. M. Cornelis Office of the Superintendent Financial Institutions Canada; and Charles Watt who served as the Executive Secretary to the Commission.

COMMISSION DE 1995 SUR LE TRAITEMENT ET LES AVANTAGES DES JUGES

AVIS

La Commission de 1995 sur le traitement et les avantages des juges a été instituée le 30 septembre 1995 par le ministre de la Justice et procureur général du Canada, en application de l'article 26 de la Loi sur les juges. Elle a pour mandat de déterminer si le traitement et les avantages des juges nommés par le gouvernement fédéral incluant le processus d'établissement du traitement des juges sont satisfaisants.

La Commission invite toute personne intéressée à lui soumettre par écrit ses vues sur les sujets qu'elle a reçu pour mission d'examiner. Ces interventions doivent prendre la forme d'un document écrit, établi dans l'une ou l'autre des deux langues officielles, et être déposées auprès de la Commission en dix exemplaires au plus tard le 20 décembre 1995. Quiconque dépose un tel document écrit peut en outre demander à la Commission d'être entendu par celle-ci. En pareil cas, il convient d'aviser la Commission au plus tard le 8 décembre 1995 du souhait de présenter des observations orales. Il convient de noter que le dépôt de documents écrits n'oblige nullement à présenter les observations orales.

Il est possible d'obtenir le texte définissant le mandat de la Commission sur simple demande.

Retirement age

8.1(1) An applications judge shall retire on attaining the age of 70 years.

(2) Subject to Part 6 of the Judicature Act, no applications judge may be removed from office before attaining retirement age.

2008 c13 s8;AR 137/2022

Reappointment of applications judges

8.2(1) Notwithstanding section 8.1(1), an applications judge may, in accordance with this section, continue in office as an applications judge.

(2) Where an applications judge is approaching the age of 70 years, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office as an applications judge for a term of one year.

(3) Where an applications judge has been approved to continue in office as an applications judge under this section, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office as an applications judge for a further term of one year.

(4) The Chief Justice may approve a person to continue in office as an applications judge under this section if

(a) the Chief Justice determines that approving that person to continue in office will enhance the efficient and effective administration of the Court, and

(b) the approval is given in accordance with and subject to the criteria established by the Chief Justice and approved by the Judicial Council.

(5), (5.1) Repealed 2017 c22 s15.

(6) An applications judge may only be approved to continue in office under this section if

(a) repealed 2017 c22 s15,

(b) the applications judge has consented to continue in office,

(c) the applications judge is not nor has been an ad hoc applications judge, and

(d) the applications judge has not attained the age of 75 years.

(7) An applications judge who has been approved to continue in office under this section may, subject to subsection (6), be approved to continue in office under subsection (3) for further terms of one year.

(8) Notwithstanding anything in this section, if an applications judge who is approved to continue in office under this section attains the age of 75 years at any time during the applications judge's term, that applications judge's term expires when that applications judge attains that age.

(9) If an applications judge is approved to continue in office under this section, the Chief Justice shall notify the person designated by the Minister no later than 20 days before the effective date of the approval in the form approved by the Minister.

(10) An applications judge who, on the coming into force of this subsection, is serving a term of office after having been reappointed under subsection (2) or (3), as they read at any time before the coming into force of this subsection, is deemed, on the coming into force of this subsection, to have been approved to continue in office for the same term.

Reappointment of half-time applications judges

8.21(1) Notwithstanding section 8.1(1), an applications judge may, in accordance with this section, continue in office as a half-time applications judge.

(2) Where an applications judge

(a) has attained the age of 55 years and has completed 10 years of service as half-time applications judge, and

(b) states in writing to the Chief Justice that the applications judge is prepared to retire as a full-time applications judge in order to continue in office as a half-time applications judge, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office as a half-time applications judge on that person's retirement as a full-time applications judge if the Chief Justice determines that approving that person to continue in office will enhance the efficient and effective administration of the Court.

(3) Where an applications judge

(a) is approaching the age of 70 years but has not attained age 70, and

(b) states in writing to the Chief Justice that the applications judge is prepared to retire at age 70 as a full-time applications judge in order to continue in office as a half-time applications judge, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office as a half-time applications judge on that person's retirement as a full-time applications judge if the conditions in subsection (6) are met.

(4) Where an applications judge

(a) has been approved to continue in office as a full-time applications judge pursuant to section 8.2, and

(b) states in writing to the Chief Justice that the applications judge is prepared to retire as a full-time applications judge in order to continue in office as a half-time applications judge, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office as a half-time applications judge on that person's retirement as a full-time applications judge if the conditions in subsection (6) are met.

(5) Where an applications judge

(a) is a half-time applications judge whose term is about to expire, and

(b) states in writing to the Chief Justice that the applications judge is prepared to continue as a half-time applications judge, the Chief Justice may approve that person to continue in office for one year as a half-time applications judge if the conditions in subsection (6) are met.

(6) The Chief Justice may approve a person to continue in office under subsection (3), (4) or (5) if

(a) the Chief Justice determines that approving that person to continue in office under subsection (3), (4) or (5) will enhance the efficient and effective administration of the Court, and

(b) the approval is given in accordance with and subject to the criteria established by the Chief Justice and approved by the Judicial Council.

(7), (7.1) Repealed 2017 c22 s15.

(8) An applications judge shall only be approved to continue in office as a half-time applications judge if

(a) the applications judge has consented to continue in office as a half-time applications judge,

(b) the applications judge is not nor has been approved to continue in office as an ad hoc applications judge, and

(c) the applications judge has not attained the age of 75 years.

(9) The term for which a half-time applications judge is approved to continue in office under this section is as follows:

(a) if the applications judge is approved to continue in office under subsection (2), the term commences on the date the applications judge is approved to continue in office as a half-time applications judge and expires on the commencement of the applications judge's 70th birthday;

(b) if the applications judge is approved to continue in office under subsection (3), the term is one year commencing on the applications judge's 70th birthday;

(c) if the applications judge is approved to continue in office under subsection (4), the term commences on the date the applications judge is approved to continue in office as a half-time applications judge and expires on the commencement of the applications judge's next birthday;

(d) if the applications judge is approved to continue in office under subsection (5), the term is one year commencing on the expiry of the previous term.

(10) A half-time applications judge must serve the equivalent of 6 months of full-time service during the year.

(11) Half-time applications judges shall, in addition to any pension benefits, be paid an annual salary of up to 50% of the annual salary of a full-time applications judge, but the total annual salary and pension benefits payable to a half-time applications judge cannot exceed the annual salary of a full-time applications judge.

(12) Notwithstanding anything in this section, the term of a half-time applications judge expires when the applications judge attains the age of 75 years.

(12.1) If an applications judge is approved to continue in office under this section, the Chief Justice shall notify the person designated by the Minister no later than 20 days before the effective date of the approval in the form approved by the Minister.

(13) Subject to Part 6 of the Judicature Act, no half-time applications judge approved to continue in office under this section may be removed from office before the expiry of that applications judge's.

(14) An applications judge who, on the coming into force of this subsection, is serving a term of office after having been appointed or reappointed under subsection (2), (3), (4) or (5), as they read at any time before the coming into force of this subsection, is deemed, on the coming into force of this subsection, to have been approved to continue in office for the same term.

Appointment of ad hoc applications judge

8.3(1) Where

(a) an applications judge retires or resigns, or

(b) the term of office of an applications judge approved to continue in office under section 8.2 expires, that person may elect to become an ad hoc applications judge.

(2) An applications judge who is retired from office under Part 6 of the Judicature Act is not entitled to elect to become an ad hoc applications judge.

(3) The Chief Justice may approve a person to continue in office as an ad hoc applications judge if the person has made an election under subsection (1).

(4) The term of an ad hoc applications judge is 2 years, but the Chief Justice may approve the ad hoc applications judge to continue in office for further periods of 2 years.

(5) Section 8.1 does not apply to an ad hoc applications judge.

(6) If an applications judge is approved to continue in office under this section, the Chief Justice shall notify the person designated by the Minister no later than 20 days before the effective date of the approval in the form approved by the Minister.

(7) An applications judge who, on the coming into force of this subsection, is serving a term of office after having been appointed under subsection (3), as it read at any time before the coming into force of this subsection, is deemed, on the coming into force of this subsection, to have been approved to continue in office for the same term.

Jurisdiction

9(1) In regard to all matters brought or proposed to be brought in the Court, an applications judge

(a) has the same power and may exercise the same jurisdiction as a judge sitting in chambers except in respect of

(i) appeals, applications in the nature of appeals, applications concerning the hearing of appeals and applications to vary or rescind an order made by a judge,

(ii) subject to subsection (2), stays of proceedings after verdict or on judgment after trial or hearing before a judge, unless all parties consent to the exercise of that jurisdiction by the applications judge, and

(iii) a matter for which the Chief Justice has given a direction that an applications judge is not to exercise that jurisdiction, and

(b) with the consent of the parties, has the same power and may exercise the same jurisdiction as a judge for hearing, determining and disposing of all applications and other matters.

(2) An applications judge may, under section 181(1)(a) of the Traffic Safety Act, order that a suspension of a licence be stayed.

(3) Notwithstanding subsection (1), the power of and the jurisdiction exercisable by an applications judge does not include

(a) the trial of actions,

(b) the determination of disputed or contentious questions of fact unless the parties agree to the disposition of the questions in chambers on affidavit evidence and without the trial of an issue or the hearing of oral evidence,

(c) any matters relating to criminal proceedings or the liberty of the subject,

(d) applications relating to civil contempt or for an injunction or a judgment or order in the nature of certiorari, prohibition, mandamus or quo warranto, or

(e) anything that by law is required to be done by a judge.

(4) Notwithstanding subsection (3), an applications judge has the same power and may exercise the same jurisdiction as the Court under sections 17 and 27 to 32 of the Maintenance Enforcement Act.

Jurisdiction

10 Notwithstanding section 48 of the Law of Property Act, an applications judge has power and jurisdiction

(a) to postpone the day fixed for redemption in any order made by the applications judge, and

(b) to reopen a final order for foreclosure made by the applications judge.

RSA 2000 cC-31 s10;AR 137/2022

Inability of applications judge to complete proceedings

10.1 If a proceeding has commenced and the presiding applications judge is unable for any reason to complete the proceedings, any applications judge requested by the Chief Justice to act may

(a) continue the proceedings to completion from where the proceedings were left off, or

(b) recommence the proceedings if in the opinion of the applications judge that is required to ensure justice.

2008 c13 s9;AR 137/2022

Judgment by former applications judge

10.2 If an applications judge ceases to hold office without giving a judgment or making an order in any matter that was fully heard by that applications judge, that person may, within 3 months after ceasing to hold office, give judgment or make an order in that matter as if that person were still an applications judge, and that judgment or order has the same effect as though given by an applications judge.

chapter T-16

COURTS OF JUSTICE ACT

1. The Courts of Québec, in civil, criminal and mixed matters, are:

The Court of Appeal;

The Superior Court;

The Court of Québec;

The Municipal Courts.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 1; 1965 (1st sess.), c. 17, s. 1; 1966-67, c. 18, s. 1; 1974, c. 11, s. 1; 1977, c. 20, s. 138; 1988, c. 21, s. 1; 1992, c. 61, s. 612.

2. The jurisdictions of the Court of Appeal, the Superior Court and the Court of Québec are general and cover the whole of Québec; the jurisdiction of the Municipal Courts is restricted to localities and the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace is provided for by law or by their deed of appointment.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 2; 1965 (1st sess.), c. 17, s. 3; 1974, c. 11, s. 4; 1977, c. 20, s. 138; 1975, c. 7, s. 2; 1988, c. 21, s. 2; 1992, c. 61, s. 613.

3. The Public Officers Act (chapter E-6), the Public Service Act (chapter F-3.1.1) and the Labour Code (chapter C-27) shall not apply to the judges of the Court of Québec, the justices of the Peace or the municipal judges acting in that capacity.

1965 (1st sess.), c. 17, s. 3; 1965 (1st sess.), c. 14, s. 82; 1965 (1st sess.), c. 15, s. 1; 1977, c. 20, s. 138; 1978, c. 15, s. 140; 1983, c. 55, s. 161; 1988, c. 21, s. 3; 1988, c. 74, s. 7; 1990, c. 44, s. 1; 1992, c. 61, s. 614.

4. The officers of justice shall be: the sheriff, the clerk of the Superior Court, the clerk of the Court of Québec and all other officers necessary for the administration of justice in Québec.

The officers of justice shall be appointed by order of the Minister of Justice who may assign them jurisdiction in more than one district.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 3; 1965 (1st sess.), c. 17, s. 2; 1983, c. 54, s. 87; 1983, c. 41, s. 209; 1986, c. 86, s. 35; 1988, c. 21, s. 4; 1992, c. 61, s. 615; 1995, c. 42, s. 47; 1999, c. 40, s. 324.

4.1. A special clerk contemplated in subparagraph e of article 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure (chapter C-25) may, in accordance with the said subparagraph, be given jurisdiction in more than one judicial district, even if he has not been appointed clerk of each of those districts.

1983, c. 28, s. 65; 1992, c. 57, s. 705; 1995, c. 42, s. 47.

5. The Minister of Justice shall also, by order, appoint a clerk of appeals for Montréal, a clerk of appeals for Québec, and as many deputy clerks of appeals as he may deem necessary.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 4; 1983, c. 54, s. 88.

5.1. Notwithstanding any other legislative provision, the clerk of a court is required to furnish at a hearing, in order to fill the office of court bailiff, only the available court bailiffs at his disposal.

1982, c. 58, s. 79; 1995, c. 42, s. 47.

5.2. In no case may an employer or his agent dismiss, suspend or transfer an employee, practise discrimination or take reprisals against him, or impose any other sanction upon him on the ground that the latter is summoned or has acted as a witness.

21. The Superior Court, which is a court of record, is composed of 143 judges including a Chief Justice, a Senior Associate Chief Justice and an Associate Chief Justice.

It shall also be composed of not more than 111 supernumerary judges governed by the Judges Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, chapter J-1). The residence of such a judge shall be the same as it was before he became a supernumerary judge.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 21; 1966, c. 7, s. 1; 1966-67, c. 18, s. 2; 1968, c. 15, s. 1; 1971, c. 14, s. 1; 1972, c. 11, s. 3; 1973, c. 13, s. 1; 1974, c. 11, s. 13; 1975, c. 10, s. 1; 1976, c. 8, s. 1; 1977, c. 17, s. 3; 1977, c. 17, s. 4; 1979, c. 42, s. 1; 1982, c. 58, s. 80; 1984, c. 26, s. 37; 1984, c. 46, s. 33; 1985, c. 29, s. 29; 1987, c. 50, s. 2; 1988, c. 21, s. 17; 1989, c. 45, s. 3.

22. The Chief Justice has charge of the general policy of the court in judicial matters.

However, the Chief Justice, the Senior Associate Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice shall, in the division where he resides, coordinate and apportion the work of the judges, and they must comply with his orders and directives in that regard.

Such paragraphs apply subject to the provisions which follow.

1974, c. 11, s. 13; 1976, c. 8, s. 2.

23. Such judges shall exercise their functions in the judicial districts assigned to them.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 22.

24. Whenever the Chief Justice of the Superior Court resides in the territory of Ville de Québec, the Senior Associate Chief Justice shall perform his duties in the division of Montréal formed by the judicial districts of Beauharnois, Bedford, Drummond, Hull, Iberville, Joliette, Labelle, Laval, Longueuil, Mégantic, Montréal, Pontiac, Richelieu, Saint-François, Saint-Hyacinthe and Terrebonne, and shall reside in the territory of or in the vicinity of Ville de Montréal.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 23; 1973, c. 13, s. 2; 1975, c. 10, s. 2; 1979, c. 15, s. 4; 1985, c. 29, s. 30; 1996, c. 2, s. 974.

25. Whenever the Chief Justice of the Superior Court resides in the territory of Ville de Montréal, the Senior Associate Chief Justice shall perform his duties in the division of Québec formed by the judicial districts of Abitibi, Alma, Arthabaska, Baie-Comeau, Beauce, Bonaventure, Charlevoix, Chicoutimi, Frontenac, Gaspé, Kamouraska, Mingan, Montmagny, Québec, Rimouski, Roberval, Rouyn-Noranda, Saint-Maurice, Témiscamingue and Trois-Rivières, and shall reside in the territory of or in the vicinity of Ville de Québec.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 24; 1966, c. 7, s. 2; 1971, c. 8, s. 5; 1973, c. 13, s. 3; 1975, c. 10, s. 3; 1979, c. 15, s. 4; 1982, c. 58, s. 81; 1985, c. 29, s. 31; 1996, c. 2, s. 975.

26. The Senior Associate Chief Justice shall, under the authority of the Chief Justice, exercise the latter's powers.

The Associate Chief Justice shall assist the Chief Justice or, as the case may be, the Senior Associate Chief Justice, residing in the territory of Ville de Montréal, in the performance of his duties.

1973, c. 13, s. 4; 1996, c. 2, s. 976.

27. The Associate Chief Justice shall exercise the powers of the Chief Justice or Senior Associate Chief Justice, as the case may be, residing in the territory of Ville de Montréal, to the extent determined by the Chief Justice or the Senior Associate Chief Justice.

The authority of the Senior Associate Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice shall be that of the Chief Justice; their orders must be executed in the same manner as those of the Chief Justice and their official signatures shall give force and effect to any document within the competence of the Chief Justice.

1973, c. 13, s. 4; 1996, c. 2, s. 977.

28. Where the Chief Justice or, as the case may be, the Senior Associate Chief Justice, residing at Montréal, is prevented from performing his duties, the Associate Chief Justice may perform such duties until the Chief Justice or, as the case may be, the Senior Associate Chief Justice, resumes them or is replaced.

1973, c. 13, s. 4; 1999, c. 40, s. 324.

29. The Senior Associate Chief Justice shall have a right of precedence immediately after the Chief Justice.

The Associate Chief Justice shall have a right of precedence immediately after the Senior Associate Chief Justice.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 25; 1973, c. 13, s. 5.

30. Whenever the Chief Justice, the Senior Associate Chief Justice or, as the case may be, the Associate Chief Justice is unable to perform his duties, the senior puisne judge, according to the date of his appointment, residing in Montréal or Québec, as the case may be, may perform such duties until the Chief Justice, the Senior Associate Chief Justice, or, as the case may be, Associate Chief Justice resumes the performance thereof or is replaced.

1965 (1st sess.), c. 17, s. 6; 1973, c. 13, s. 6; 1999, c. 40, s. 324.

30.1. Where the chief justice, the senior associate chief justice or the associate chief justice informs the Minister of Justice and the federal Minister of Justice of his decision to abandon his office of chief justice, senior associate chief justice or associate chief justice, as the case may be, the Superior Court is then deemed to be composed, until a vacancy occurs, of the number of judges provided for by section 21 and of one additional office of judge.

1978, c. 19, s. 51 (part).

31. No judge of the Superior Court shall, while a judge, sit in the Conseil exécutif or in the National Assembly, or hold any other remunerated public office.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 26; 1968, c. 9, s. 74, s. 90; 1977, c. 5, s. 14; 1999, c. 40, s. 324.

31.1. For the purposes of section 41 of the Judges Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, chapter J-1), a judge of the Superior Court may, in his quality as a judge of that court and with the authorization of the chief justice, take part in an event connected with the administration of justice.

1987, c. 92, s. 2.

32. The judges of the Superior Court shall be appointed for the several districts of Québec, as follows:

(1) For the district of Montréal, with residence in the territory of Ville de Montréal or in the immediate vicinity thereof, 89 judges; one of whom shall have special charge of the district of Terrebonne, another of the district of Beauharnois, another of the district of Richelieu, another of the district of Saint-Hyacinthe, another of the district of Pontiac, another of the district of Hull, another of the district of Labelle, who shall also exercise his ordinary functions in the district of Hull, another of the district of Bedford, another of the district of Iberville, and another of the district of Joliette;

The judges appointed for the district of Montréal shall also exercise their ordinary functions in the districts of Laval and Longueuil in accordance with the orders of the Chief Justice, the Senior Associate Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice, as the case may be.

The judges appointed with residence in the territory of Ville de Montréal may also reside in the districts of Laval and Longueuil.

(1.1) For the district of Longueuil, with residence in the territory of Ville de Longueuil or in its vicinity, one judge;

(2) For the district of Québec, with residence in the territory of Ville de Québec or in the immediate vicinity thereof, 30 judges, one of whom shall have special charge of the districts of Gaspé and Bonaventure, another of the district of Beauce, another of the district of Montmagny, another of the district of Arthabaska, another of the district of Kamouraska, another of the district of Charlevoix and another of the district of Roberval;

(3) For districts of Mégantic and Saint-François, with residence in the territory of Ville de Sherbrooke or in the immediate vicinity thereof, three judges;

(4) For the district of Trois-Rivières, with residence in the territory of Ville de Trois-Rivières or in its immediate vicinity, three judges;

(5) For the districts of Abitibi, Rouyn-Noranda and Témiscamingue, with residence at Amos or at Rouyn or in the immediate vicinity thereof, three judges;

(6) For the districts of Saint-François and Bedford, three judges, including two with residence at Sherbrooke or in the vicinity and one with residence at Cowansville or in the vicinity;

(7) For the districts of Hull, Labelle and Pontiac, with residence at Hull or in its immediate vicinity, four judges;

(7.1) For the district of Alma, with residence in Alma or in the immediate vicinity thereof, one judge;

(8) For the district of Chicoutimi, with residence at Chicoutimi or in its immediate vicinity, three judges;

(9) For the district of Rimouski, with residence, at the option of the judge, at Rimouski or Rivière-du-Loup or in the immediate vicinity thereof, one judge;

(10) For the district of Saint-Maurice, with residence at Shawinigan or its immediate vicinity, one judge;

(11) For the districts of Baie-Comeau and Mingan, with residence at Sept-Iles or in its immediate vicinity, one judge.

Such judges must administer justice in turn in each of the other districts of Québec, as instructed by the Chief Justice, of the Senior Associate Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice, as the case may be.

The Government, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Justice and with the consent of the Chief Justice, may authorize a judge to reside at a place other than that provided for in this section.

R. 33. (1) The judges to whom are assigned respectively the districts of Terrebonne, Beauharnois, Richelieu, Saint-Hyacinthe and Pontiac shall exercise their ordinary functions in any court wherein the judges of the court have jurisdiction, whenever their services are not required in their respective districts.

(2) One of the judges of the districts from which appeals are heard in the territory of Ville de Québec, may be called upon by competent authority to exercise his ordinary functions in the district of Québec, when such functions are not required in his district, and such judge shall reside in the territory of Ville de Québec.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 28; 1996, c. 2, s. 979.

34. Whenever the despatch of judicial business in any district requires the services of more judges than there are in such district, the chief justice shall require one or more judges to discharge their duties temporarily in such district.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 29.

35. All the powers which by any Act were vested in any judges or quorum of the Superior Court, in term or out of term, at the time of the coming into force of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, and which were by the said statutes vested in any such judge, have since been and are now, vested in any one judge of the court, so that one judge constitutes a quorum of the court and may hear and determine all causes and matters within the jurisdiction of the court, and exercise all the powers of the court with regard thereto.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 32; 1995, c. 42, s. 5.

36. Any judge may continue and complete any matter commenced or continued by another, but shall not reverse any decision of such other judge, unless the decision be such that he might reverse it if it were his own.

The Chief Justice, the Senior Associate Chief Justice or, as the case may be, the Associate Chief Justice may order that a matter under advisement for more than six months be replaced on the roll to be completed by another judge.

Likewise, the chief justice of the Superior Court, the Senior Associate Chief Justice or the associate chief justice, as the case may be, may and has always had the power to sign a judgment rendered by a judge since deceased, provided that he be satisfied that the text of the judgment presented to him to be signed is in conformity with the judgment which has been rendered.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 33; 1973, c. 13, s. 8.

37. In all proceedings commenced in vacation before one judge, it shall be competent, in case of the illness or absence of such judge, for any other judge to sit in his place and to exercise the power and authority which would have been exercised by the judge so ill or absent, had he continued to sit.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 34.

38. Two or more judges discharging their duties in the same district may and shall, whenever the despatch of business requires, sit at the same time and at the same place, but in separate apartments, in term or in vacation, and each shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all cases and matters submitted to him, and the same power as if he were the only judge sitting in such place.

R. S. 1964, c. 20, s. 35.

§ 2. — General Powers of the Court

39. As regards any unrepealed provisions of any Act in force in Québec at the time the Act 12 Victoria, Chapter 38, came into force, the Superior Court shall continue to be substituted for the Court of Queen's Bench, abolished by the said Act.

Such unrepealed provision shall continue to apply to the Superior Court, as it theretofore applied to the said Court of Queen's Bench.

Such superintending and reforming power and control shall continue to be vested in and assigned to the Superior Court and the judges thereof.

Report by family counsellor, social worker

11.4(1) Upon ex parte application or on the judge's own motion a judge of the Family Division may direct a family counsellor, social worker, probation officer or other person to make a report concerning any matter that, in the opinion of the judge, is a subject of the proceeding.

11.4(2) A person directed to make a report under subsection (1) shall file a written report with the clerk together with a copy of the report for each party to the proceeding and for the judge, and the clerk shall cause a copy of the report to be served on each party to the proceeding, and a copy to be delivered to the judge.

11.4(2.1) The parties to the proceeding shall pay for the costs of the report made under subsection (1) in equal portions unless the judge of the Family Division directs that one party pay the cost in total or that the parties pay the cost in unequal portions as specified by the judge.

11.4(3) Notwithstanding any rule of evidence to the contrary, the contents of a report filed under subsection (2) shall be evidence in the proceeding.

11.4(4) A person filing a report under subsection (2) is a competent and compellable witness.

11.4(5) Any party, including the party calling the person as a witness, may cross-examine the person referred to in subsection (4).

11.4(6) The judge may order that a report filed under subsection (2) and any cross-examination of the person making the report shall be treated as confidential and shall not form part of the public record.

Rapport d'un conseiller familial, travailleur social ou agent de probation

11.4(1) À la suite d'une demande ex parte ou de sa propre initiative, un juge de la Division de la famille peut charger un conseiller familial, un travailleur social, un agent de probation ou toute autre personne de faire un rapport sur toute question qui, selon lui, a des liens avec la procédure.

11.4(2) La personne chargée de rédiger un rapport en vertu du paragraphe (1) doit déposer auprès du greffier un rapport écrit, plus une copie de ce rapport pour le juge et pour chacune des parties en cause; et le greffier doit en faire signifier une copie à chacune des parties en cause et en faire remettre une au juge.

11.4(2.1) Les parties en cause doivent payer les frais de préparation du rapport prévu au paragraphe (1) à parts égales, à moins que le juge de la Division de la famille n'ordonne le paiement de la totalité des frais par une des parties ou le paiement des frais à parts inégales par les parties selon les indications du juge.

11.4(3) Nonobstant toutes règles contraires en matière de preuve, le contenu d'un rapport déposé en vertu du paragraphe (2) constitue une preuve dans la procédure.

11.4(4) La personne qui dépose le rapport en vertu du paragraphe (2) est un témoin qualifié et contraignable.

11.4(5) Toute partie, y compris celle qui a fait assigner la personne mentionnée au paragraphe (4) en qualité de témoin, peut la contre-interroger.

11.4(6) Le juge peut ordonner que le rapport déposé en vertu du paragraphe (2) et tout contre-interrogatoire de l'auteur dudit rapport soient considérés comme confidentiels et par conséquent ne fassent pas partie du dossier public.

Fonctions du juge en chef

12(1) Le juge en chef du Nouveau-Brunswick détermine la politique générale de la Cour d'appel et de la Cour du Banc du Roi en matière judiciaire.

12(2) Le juge en chef du Nouveau-Brunswick et le juge en chef de la Cour du Banc du Roi doivent répartir et coordonner le travail des juges dans leur cour respective et tous les juges doivent observer les ordonnances et directives des juges en chef qui s'y rapportent.

12(3) Un juge en chef adjoint doit exercer les fonctions que lui assigne le juge en chef de la Cour du Banc du Roi.

S.R., ch. 120, art. 15; 1966, ch. 70, art. 11; 1978, ch. 32, art. 10; 2001, ch. 29, art. 5; 2023, ch. 17, art. 129

Responsabilités du juge en chef

12.01(1) Pour assurer le bon fonctionnement de la Cour, le juge en chef de la Cour du Banc du Roi est chargé de l'administration des responsabilités judiciaires de la Cour du Banc du Roi relativement à la magistrature.

12.01(2) Dans l'exercice des fonctions que lui confèrent le paragraphe (1) et toute autre disposition de la and without limiting the generality of that subsection or any other provision, the Chief Justice

(a) shall direct and supervise the assignment of judicial duties to individual judges and may alter those duties from time to time,

(b) shall determine the total annual, monthly and weekly workload of individual judges,

(c) may require a judge to act during the absence of another judge in the place of the judge who is absent,

(d) may designate the place where a judge is to hold sittings and the days on which he or she is to hold such sittings, and

(e) may designate the place where a judge is to establish and maintain an office.

12.01(3) Subject to subsections (4) and (5), the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, with the consent of the Minister of Justice, may designate the place at which a judge is to establish residence.

12.01(4) If the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench designates a place at which a judge is to establish residence under subsection (3), the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench shall not designate a new place of residence for the judge without first obtaining the consent of the Minister of Justice and the judge.

12.01(5) If, before the commencement of this subsection, the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench designated a place at which a judge was to establish residence, the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench shall not designate a new place of residence for the judge without first obtaining the consent of the Minister of Justice and the judge.

Rehearing of decision

32. (1) When a judge who has reserved a decision in a proceeding

(a) dies without giving a decision;

(b) retires, resigns or is appointed to another court without having given the decision within the time set out in section 31; or

(c) does not give the decision within 12 months from the time it was reserved by that judge, a judge may upon application order that the proceeding be retried or reheard by another judge.

(2) Upon the retrial or rehearing under subsection (1), the judge retrying or rehearing the proceeding may direct that the retrial or rehearing

(a) be upon a transcript of the court reporter's notes;

(b) be upon that transcript and additional evidence given orally or by affidavit;

(c) be upon that transcript and additional evidence given orally and by affidavit;

(d) be upon new evidence; or

(e) otherwise.

(3) The judge presiding at the retrial or rehearing may give direction as to the disposition of the costs of the original trial or hearing and the cost of obtaining and providing copies of the transcript of the court reporter's notes.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS

Descriptions of districts and resident judges

25 (1) The Province consists of the following judicial districts:

(a) Cape Breton District, consisting of the counties of Cape Breton, Inverness, Richmond and Victoria;

(b) Central District, consisting of the counties of Antigonish, Colchester, Cumberland, Guysborough and Pictou and the Municipality of the District of East Hants;

(c) Halifax District, consisting of the County of Halifax;

(d) Southwestern District, consisting of the Counties of Annapolis, Digby, Kings, Lunenburg, Queens, Shelburne and Yarmouth and the Municipality of the District of West Hants.

(2) There shall be for each judicial district at least two judges of the Supreme Court designated as resident judges.

(3) Subject to subsection (4), the resident judges shall be designated by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court after consultation with the Attorney General.

(4) A judge of the Supreme Court who was, immediately prior to the coming into force of this subsection, a judge of a county court is deemed to be designated as a resident judge for the judicial district in which that county court would be located but for its abolition.

(5) A designation of a judge pursuant to or deemed by this Section shall not be changed or rescinded except with the consent of that judge.

(6) A resident judge shall reside within the judicial district for which the judge is designated. 1992, c. 16, s. 52.

Power to establish justice centres and areas

26 The Minister of Justice may establish justice centres and for each the justice centre area it serves. 1996, c. 23, s. 11.

OATH OF JUSTICES

Oath of office

27 (1) Before assuming the duties of his office, a judge of the Court shall take the following oath:

> I do solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, that I will duly and faithfully, and to the best of my skill and knowledge, execute the powers and trusts reposed in me as . . . . . So help me God.

(2) The oath shall be administered by the Lieutenant Governor or such person as is appointed by him to administer the same or by any person who is appointed by the Governor General to administer oaths of office. R.S., c. 240, s. 27.

SESSIONS AND SITTINGS

Sessions and sittings

28 Subject to the Rules, the Supreme Court and the judges thereof shall have power to sit and act at any time and at any place for the transaction of any part of the business of the Supreme Court, or of a judge, or for the discharge of any duty which by any statute or otherwise is required to be discharged. R.S., c. 240, s. 28; 1992, c. 16, s. 54.

Rules

29 The judges of the Supreme Court or a majority of them, in addition to any other such power granted to them by this Act, may make rules respecting sessions, sittings or circuits of the Supreme Court and any matter relating thereto. R.S., c. 240, s. 29; 1992, c. 16, s. 54.

Special sittings

30 (1) Whenever it appears necessary for the disposal of any proceeding in any county, the Supreme Court may order special sittings of the Supreme Court to be held in such county for the trial and disposal of such proceeding.

(2) The judge presiding at such sittings may hear and determine any proceeding which may be disposed of by a judge sitting in court or chambers. R.S., c. 240, s. 30; 1992, c. 16, s. 54.

Extension and adjournment of sittings

31 The presiding judge may from time to time in his discretion extend and adjourn any sittings for such time as he deems necessary for the disposal of any proceeding on the docket. R.S., c. 240, s. 31.

Delay of sittings

SUPREME COURT ACT

[RSBC 1996] CHAPTER 443

Contents

Definitions

1 In this Act:

"associate judge" means an associate judge of the court;

"court" means the Supreme Court of British Columbia;

"judge" means a judge of the court;

"judicial district" means a judicial district defined by this Act;

"order" includes a judgment and a decree;

"proceeding" includes an action, suit, cause, matter, appeal, petition proceeding or requisition proceeding;

"registry" means an office of the Supreme Court in a judicial district.

Supreme Court of British Columbia

2 (1) The Supreme Court of British Columbia is continued under the name and style of the "Supreme Court of British Columbia".

(2) The court consists of

(a) a Chief Justice, who is called "Chief Justice of the Supreme Court",

(b) an Associate Chief Justice, and

(c) 95 other judges.

(3) The court has for each office established under subsection (2) an additional office of supernumerary judge.

(4) The judges appointed to the offices established under subsections (2) and (3) are and are to be called "judges of the Supreme Court".

(5) For the office of Chief Justice, there is, subject to subsection (2), an additional office of judge that the Chief Justice may elect, under the Judges Act (Canada), to hold.

(6) The court is properly constituted despite a vacancy in the office of Chief Justice, of Associate Chief Justice or of a judge.

Powers of Chief Justice

2.1 (1) The Chief Justice has responsibility for

(a) the administration of the judges of court, and

(b) the administration of associate judges, registrars and district registrars.

(2) Powers of the Chief Justice may be delegated to the Associate Chief Justice.

(3) If the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice are absent or unable to act, the powers of the Chief Justice may be exercised by the next senior non-supernumerary judge who resides in the judicial district of Vancouver Westminster.

(4) Each judge, associate judge, registrar and district registrar must, as soon as practicable after being appointed, reside at the place or within the area approved in writing by the Chief Justice.

(5) Before giving approval under subsection (4), the Chief Justice must consult with the Attorney General.

(6) A judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar must not change their residence from the place or area referred to in subsection (4) unless

(a) the judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar, as applicable, consents to the move, and

(b) the Chief Justice approves the move.

(7) Before giving approval under subsection (6), the Chief Justice must consult with the Attorney General.

(8) The Chief Justice may direct that a judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar sit at a location other than the one in which the judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar resides.

(9) The Chief Justice may require a judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar to attend a meeting, conference or seminar for a purpose relating to the administration of justice.

Powers and privileges

3 (1) The Chief Justice, Associate Chief Justice and judges have all the powers, rights, incidents, privileges and immunities of a judge of a superior court of record, and all other powers, rights, incidents, privileges and immunities that on March 29, 1870, were vested in the Chief Justice and the other justices of the court.

(2) The court may be held before the Chief Justice or before any one of the judges.

Precedence

4 (1) The Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice have the rank and precedence set out in section 7 of the Court of Appeal Act.

(2) The judges have rank and precedence immediately after the most junior justice of the Court of Appeal, and among themselves, according to the seniority of their appointment to the court.

(3) Those judges of the County Courts who were appointed on the occasion of the merger of the County Courts and Supreme Court as a result of the enactment of this Act, have rank and precedence after all judges then holding office, and among themselves, after the Chief Judge of the County Courts, according to the seniority of their first appointment to a County Court.

Repealed

4.1 [Repealed 2018-36-11.]

Repealed

5 [Repealed 2018-36-11.]

Powers after leaving office — judges

6 (1) A judge who resigns the judge's office, is appointed to another court or ceases to hold office under section 99 (2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, may, after the resignation, appointment or ceasing to hold office, give judgment in a proceeding the judge heard while holding office, and the judgment is effective as though the judge still held office.

(2) A judge who is appointed to another court may continue with the hearing of any proceeding of which the judge was seized, and the jurisdiction to hear the proceeding and give judgment is effective as though the judge still held office.

Seal

7 (1) The court must have a seal bearing Her Majesty's Royal Arms and the name "Supreme Court of British Columbia" and other words the Attorney General considers necessary.

(2) The seal is to be used by the court as the occasion requires.

(3) A print of the seal stamped on a document requiring a seal of the court is, for all purposes, deemed to be an impression of the seal of the court.

Judicial districts

8 (1) Judicial districts are constituted by counties, as defined by the County Boundary Act, such that:

(a) the County of Victoria is a judicial district under the name of the "Victoria Judicial District";

(b) the County of Nanaimo is a judicial district under the name of the "Nanaimo Judicial District";

(c) and (d) [Repealed 1997-28-17.]

(d.1) the County of Vancouver and the County of Westminster are collectively a judicial district under the name of the "Vancouver Westminster Judicial District";

(e) the County of Yale is a judicial district under the name of the "Yale Judicial District";

(f) the County of Cariboo is a judicial district under the name of the "Cariboo Judicial District";

(g) the County of Kootenay is a judicial district under the name of the "Kootenay Judicial District";

(h) the County of Prince Rupert is a judicial district under the name of the "Prince Rupert Judicial District".

(2) and (3) [Repealed 2013-7-30.]

(4) [Repealed 2002-37-21.]

(5) [Repealed 2018-36-11.]

Jurisdiction and sittings

9 (1) The court continues to be a court of original jurisdiction and has jurisdiction in all cases, civil and criminal, arising in British Columbia.

(2) The court may sit and act, at any time and at any place, for the transaction of any part of its business, civil or criminal, or for the discharge of any duty.

(2.1) Without limiting subsection (2), and despite any rule of law or enactment to the contrary, any criminal or civil matter that under any rule of law or enactment is to be or must be heard, or that an accused or a party is entitled to have heard, by the court in one of the County of Vancouver or the County of Westminster may be heard at any place within the Vancouver Westminster Judicial District that the court appoints.

(3) Subject to the direction of the Chief Justice, the court must sit in each place where there is a registry of the court as often as is necessary for the reasonable dispatch of civil trials and other business.

(4) The registrar must prepare a calendar of the dates when the court proposes to sit in any place to be published in the registry located there.

Repealed

10 [Repealed 2018-36-11.]

Appointment of associate judges

11 (1) On the recommendation of the Attorney General after consultation with the Chief Justice, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint one or more associate judges of the court.

(2) A person must not be appointed as an associate judge unless that person is a member in good standing of the Law Society of British Columbia at the time of appointment.

(3) An associate judge is entitled to the remuneration, allowances and benefits established under the following sections of the Judicial Compensation Act, as those sections apply to Provincial Court judges:

(a) and (a.1) [Repealed 2023-47-3.]

(a.2) section 5.1 (3), (4) and (6) [Lieutenant Governor in Council may accept all recommendations];

(a.3) section 6 (2) to (6) [reports before the Legislative Assembly];

(b) section 8 [salary of judges];

(c) section 10 [expenses reimbursed];

(d) section 11 [vacation leave];

(e) section 12 [leave of absence];

(f) section 13 [sickness or disability benefit plan].

Associate judges electing senior status

11.1 (1) On or after reaching 55 years of age, an associate judge with at least 10 years' service as an associate judge may elect to hold office part time as a senior associate judge under this section, with judicial duties assigned by the Chief Justice.

(2) Unless otherwise approved by the Chief Justice, an associate judge who wishes to elect senior status under subsection (1) must give notice to the Chief Justice and the Attorney General at least 6 months before the date on which the associate judge wishes to cease full time service.

(3) The Chief Justice may specify the form and manner in which notice is to be given under subsection (2).

(4) An election of senior status under subsection (1) is irrevocable once the associate judge begins service as a senior associate judge under subsection (1), and the senior associate judge may not resume full time service.

(5) The number of sitting days in each year of a senior associate judge's service is calculated according to the following formula:

$$\frac{\text{PT annual salary}}{\text{FT annual salary}} \times 1.25 \times \text{FT sitting days} = \text{number of sitting days}$$

where

PT annual salary	is the annual salary of the senior associate judge,
FT annual salary	is the annual salary of an associate judge who has not elected senior status under this section, and
FT sitting days	is the annual number of sitting days, set by the Chief Justice, of an associate judge who has not elected senior status under this section.

Term of office of associate judge

11.2 (1) Subject to this Act, an associate judge holds office during good behaviour.

(2) An associate judge may resign by submitting to the Attorney General and the Chief Justice a notice of resignation in writing that states the effective date of the resignation, and the resignation becomes effective on that date.

(3) An associate judge ceases to hold office as an associate judge on the earliest of the following:

(a) the end of the month in which the associate judge reaches 75 years of age;

(b) 7 years from the date that the associate judge elects senior status and ceases full time service;

(c) the effective date of a resignation submitted under subsection (2).

Duties and powers of associate judge

11.3 (1) Associate judges must devote themselves exclusively to judicial duties and must not engage, directly or indirectly, in any other occupation, profession or business.

(2) Subject to the limitations of section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, an associate judge has the same jurisdiction under any enactment or the Rules of Court as a judge in chambers unless, in respect of any matter, the Chief Justice has given a direction that an associate judge is not to exercise that jurisdiction.

(3) Wherever a power is given to the registrar, a district registrar or a deputy district registrar under an enactment, that power may be exercised by an associate judge.

(4) An associate judge may administer an oath.

(5) An action must not be brought against an associate judge for damages for anything done or omitted in good faith by the associate judge

(a) in the performance or intended performance of any duty, or

(b) in the exercise or intended exercise of any power.

(6) Subsection (5) does not absolve the government from vicarious liability for an act or omission for which the government would be vicariously liable if subsection (5) were not in force.

Powers after leaving office — associate judges

11.4 An associate judge who resigns an appointment as associate judge or who is appointed as a judge may, within 180 days after the resignation or appointment, give judgment in a proceeding the associate judge heard while holding office, and the judgment is effective as though the associate judge still held office.

Pensions for associate judges

12 (1) Subject to this section, an associate judge is entitled to the pension benefits established under sections 16 to 24 of the Judicial Compensation Act.

(2) For purposes of giving effect to subsection (1),

(a) "December 1, 2002" is substituted for "January 1, 2001" wherever it appears in sections 16 to 24 of the Judicial Compensation Act, and

(b) sections 16 to 24 of the Judicial Compensation Act are to be read with necessary changes.

Pensions for senior associate judges

12.1 (1) This section applies to associate judges who have elected senior status under section 11.1.

(2) In this section:

"pension plan rules" means the rules of the Public Service Pension Plan;

"Public Service Pension Plan" means the Public Service Pension Plan continued under the Public Service Pension Plan Joint Trust Agreement;

"Public Service Pension Plan Joint Trust Agreement" means the agreement established under section 18 of Schedule C of the Public Sector Pension Plans Act.

(3) Despite section 18 of the Judicial Compensation Act, a senior associate judge is not entitled to make contributions or have contributions made on the senior associate judge's behalf to the Public Service Pension Plan in respect of service as a senior associate judge.

(4) A senior associate judge is, on the date that the associate judge's full time service ceases, entitled to receive a pension under the Public Service Pension Plan in accordance with the pension plan rules and with Part 3 of the Judicial Compensation Act, as that Part applies to Provincial Court judges, and the cessation of full time service is deemed to be a termination of the senior associate judge's employment, but only for the purposes of those pension plan rules.

(5) Service as a senior associate judge does not, for any purpose, count as contributory service or pensionable service.

Registrars

13 (1) A registrar and one or more district registrars, deputy district registrars and persons necessary to assist them may be appointed under the Public Service Act.

(2) The registrar, district registrars and deputy district registrars may carry out the duties assigned to a registrar by the rules and under any other enactment.

(3) The registrar may appoint a person to act temporarily as a district registrar or a deputy district registrar.

(4) Registrars and district registrars must devote themselves exclusively to judicial duties and must not engage, directly or indirectly, in any other occupation, profession or business.

Trial and subsequent proceedings

14 (1) All proceedings in the court and all business arising from those proceedings, if practicable and convenient, must be heard, determined and disposed of before a single judge.

(2) All proceedings subsequent to the hearing or trial including the final order, except as otherwise provided, and on a rehearing must, if practicable and convenient, be before the judge before whom the trial or hearing took place.

Transfer to Provincial Court

15 A judge or associate judge may transfer proceedings to the Provincial Court of British Columbia if

(a) the proceedings are within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Court under the Small Claims Act,

(b) a party to the proceedings applies to the judge or associate judge, or all parties to the proceedings agree to the transfer, and

(c) the judge or associate judge considers it appropriate to do so.

Power to reserve decision

16 A judge, associate judge, registrar or district registrar may reserve their own decision.

Issues may be submitted to jury

17 Nothing in an Act or the rules takes away or prejudices the right of a party to an action to have the issues for trial by jury submitted and left by the judge to the jury before whom the party comes for trial, with a proper and complete direction to the jury on the law and the evidence applicable to the issues.

Vexatious proceedings

18 If, on application by any person, the court is satisfied that a person has habitually, persistently and without reasonable grounds, instituted vexatious legal proceedings in the Supreme Court or in the Provincial Court against the same or different persons, the court may, after hearing that person or giving the person an opportunity to be heard, order that a legal proceeding must not, without leave of the court, be instituted by that person in any court.

Court administration

18.1 (1) The Attorney General is responsible for the provision, operation and maintenance of court facilities, registries and administrative services.

(2) A chief administrator of court services, an administrator of court services for each registry and other persons necessary to carry out this Act and the duties assigned to a registry may be appointed under the Public Service Act.

(3) Subject to the direction of the Attorney General, and to the direction of the Chief Justice in matters of judicial administration and the use of courtroom facilities, the chief administrator of court services must direct and supervise registries and administrative services for the court.

(4) The chief administrator of court services, for the purposes of carrying out the duties of that person under this Act, may disclose to the Chief Justice information regarding the conduct of persons appointed under subsection (2) in the performance of their duties under this Act.

PART 2
The Court and Judges

Continuation of court

2-1(1) His Majesty's Court of King's Bench for Saskatchewan is continued as the superior court of record in and for Saskatchewan that has civil and criminal jurisdiction.

(2) During the reign of a king, the court shall be called His Majesty's Court of King's Bench for Saskatchewan and, during the reign of a queen, the court shall be called Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench for Saskatchewan.

(3) In all documents and proceedings in the court, the court is sufficiently designated by the words "In the King's Bench" or "In the Queen's Bench".

(4) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may determine the seal to be used in the court.

2023, c 28, s.2-1.

Judges

2-2(1) The court consists of:

(a) a chief justice, who is styled the Chief Justice of the King's Bench;

(b) an associate chief justice, who is styled the Associate Chief Justice of the King's Bench; and

(c) 36 other judges.

(2) The Lieutenant Governor may, by proclamation, increase or decrease the number of judges and, in the case of a decrease, may provide for the decrease to take effect when a vacancy occurs in the court.

(3) For each office of judge provided for by subsection (1) or by proclamation pursuant to subsection (2), there shall be the additional office of supernumerary judge.

(4) Each supernumerary judge shall carry out the judicial duties that the chief justice assigns to that supernumerary judge.

2023, c 28, s.2-2.

Duties of associate chief justice

2-3(1) The associate chief justice shall carry out the administrative duties that the chief justice assigns to the associate chief justice.

(2) If the chief justice is absent or unable to act, the powers and duties of the chief justice shall devolve on the associate chief justice, or, in the absence or inability to act of the associate chief justice, on a judge designated by the chief justice.

2023, c 28, s.2-3.

Oath of office

2-4 Before entering on the duties of office, a judge shall take the following oath, administered by the Lieutenant Governor, the chief justice or another judge:

I, _____ , do swear (or solemnly affirm) that I will well and truly serve our Sovereign Lord the King in the office of Chief Justice (or a Judge) of His Majesty's Court of King's Bench for Saskatchewan, and that I will duly and faithfully, and according to the best of my skill and knowledge, exercise the powers and trusts reposed in me as Chief Justice (or a Judge) of that court. (So help me God).

2023, c 28, s.2-4.

Residence of judges

2-5(1) Each judge shall reside at any judicial centre or other place in Saskatchewan that the chief justice directs.

(2) A judge, on taking up residence in accordance with a direction made pursuant to subsection (1), shall not be required to make a change of residence unless the judge consents to the change.

2023, c 28, s.2-5.

Family Law Division

2-6(1) The division of the court called the Family Law Division is continued.

(2) Family law proceedings brought in the court are to be brought in the Family Law Division.

(3) Subject to subsection (4), the chief justice shall assign 10 judges to act as judges of the Family Law Division.

(4) In a proclamation pursuant to subsection 2-2(2) increasing or decreasing the number of judges, the Lieutenant Governor may provide for an increase or decrease in the number of judges to be assigned to the Family Law Division.

(5) The chief justice may assign a judge of the Family Law Division to hear actions or matters outside the Family Law Division, but only if the assignment does not prevent that judge from spending the substantial majority of the judge's time hearing actions or matters in the Family Law Division.

(6) In addition to the judges assigned to the Family Law Division pursuant to subsection (3), the chief justice may, from time to time, assign any other judge to act as a judge of the Family Law Division.

2023, c 28, s.2-6.

Judges are justices of peace, etc., by virtue of office

2-7 Each judge is, by virtue of that office, a coroner, a justice of the peace and a judge of the Provincial Court, and is deemed to have been appointed to each of those offices.

2023, c 28, s.2-7.

PART 3
Jurisdiction and Powers

Jurisdiction of the court

3-1(1) The court has original jurisdiction throughout Saskatchewan, with full power and authority to consider, hear, try and determine actions and matters.

(2) Subject to this Act and the rules of court, the court may be held before one or more judges.

(3) Judges have jurisdiction throughout Saskatchewan.

(4) Every judge has jurisdiction to hear and determine any action or matter in the court, including actions or matters in the Family Law Division.

(5) On the direction of the Lieutenant Governor in a particular case, the court may exercise the jurisdiction and powers of the Lieutenant Governor as a visitor.

Ethical Principles for Judges

Principes de déontologie judiciaire

Conseil canadien de la magistrature

Foreword

As the Canadian Judicial Council marks its 50th anniversary of service to Canadians, it is timely that we have revised and modernized Ethical Principles for Judges. From their first publication in 1998, these principles have laid out the ethical frame of reference to which all judges aspire: judicial independence, integrity and respect, diligence and competence, equality and impartiality.

Canada is fortunate to be served by a highly competent and skilled judiciary. Judges can face ethical questions as we go about our personal and professional lives. While the 1998 document served us well, and indeed was the model on which other judicial systems around the world relied, we understand that ethical considerations evolve and need to keep pace with society's expectations.

When I was appointed Chief Justice of Canada, I was pleased to learn that the Canadian Judicial Council had embarked on a public consultation exercise to hear firsthand from Canadians and our valued partners, what they expect of our judges. From those extensive consultations, and the tireless work of the Council's Judicial Independence and Appointment Process Committee, co-chaired by Chief Justice Martel D. Popescul and Chief Justice Deborah K. Smith, a new and refreshed document emerged.

Préface

L'édition revue et actualisée des Principes de déontologie judiciaire arrive à point nommé, alors que le Conseil canadien de la magistrature célèbre 50 ans de service à la population canadienne. Depuis la parution de la première édition en 1998, ces principes constituent le cadre de référence déontologique auquel tous les juges aspirent : l'indépendance judiciaire, l'intégrité et le respect, la diligence et la compétence, l'égalité et l'impartialité.

Le Canada a la chance d'être servi par une magistrature hautement compétente et qualifiée. Les juges sont parfois confrontés à des questions déontologiques dans leur vie personnelle et professionnelle. Bien que l'édition de 1998 nous ait bien servi, et qu'elle ait été prise pour modèle par d'autres systèmes judiciaires du monde entier, nous comprenons que les considérations d'ordre déontologique évoluent et qu'elles doivent s'adapter aux attentes de la société.

Lorsque j'ai été nommé juge en chef du Canada, j'ai été heureux d'apprendre que le Conseil canadien de la magistrature avait amorcé un processus de consultation publique pour entendre directement ce que la population canadienne et nos partenaires estimés attendent de nos juges. À la suite de ces vastes consultations et du travail inlassable du Comité sur l'indépendance judiciaire et le processus de nomination du Conseil, coprésidé par le juge en chef Martel D. Popescul et la juge en chef Deborah K. Smith, un nouveau document actualisé a pris forme. Je sais que le comité a examiné attentivement tous les commentaires qu'il a reçus, et je remercie personnellement toutes les personnes qui ont fait connaître leurs points de vue.

I know that the Committee carefully considered every comment received and I personally extend my thanks to every person who provided his or her views.

The revised Ethical Principles build on the original publication, and explore new and emerging issues relevant to our modern times: case management and settlement conferences, social media, interacting with self-represented litigants, professional development and the post-judicial role. While these principles are intended to assist judges with the ethical and professional questions they may confront, they are also written to provide the public with a better understanding of the judicial role.

I am proud of this document and proud of the dedication of those who developed it. It is my sincere hope that Ethical Principles will be consulted regularly by judges for years to come.

Sincerely,

The Right Honourable
Richard Wagner, P.C.

Chief Justice of Canada and Chairperson of the Canadian Judicial Council

Cette version révisée des Principes de déontologie judiciaire s'appuie sur l'édition originale et traite de questions nouvelles et naissantes qui ont rapport à nos temps modernes : la gestion des instances et les conférences de règlement, les médias sociaux, l'interaction avec les parties non représentées par un avocat, le perfectionnement professionnel, et le rôle des juges après leur départ de la magistrature. Ces principes visent à aider les juges à trouver réponse aux questions déontologiques et professionnelles qui peuvent se poser à la magistrature, mais ils sont aussi rédigés pour permettre au public de mieux comprendre le rôle des juges.

Je suis fier de ce document et fier du dévouement des personnes qui y ont travaillé. J'espère sincèrement que les juges consulteront régulièrement les Principes de déontologie judiciaire dans les années à venir.

Je vous offre mes meilleures salutations.

Le très honorable
Richard Wagner, c.p.

Juge en chef du Canada et Président du Conseil canadien de la magistrature

Introduction

Purpose

1. Ethical Principles for Judges [Ethical Principles] provides ethical guidance for federally appointed judges. In doing so, it expresses a vision of what it means to be a judge. Taken together, the principles of independence, integrity and respect, diligence and competence, equality and impartiality define the judicial role. Ethical Principles was drafted with confidence that it would be read by judges and the public as an expression of the judiciary's highest ethical aspirations in the service of justice and the rule of law.

2. An independent and impartial judiciary is the right of all and constitutes a fundamental pillar of democratic governance, the rule of law and justice in Canada. Everyone needs and deserves impartial, competent, and respectful judges. All members of the judiciary commit to perform their role in such a manner so as to maintain the confidence of the public. The guidance that follows describes the high ethical standards that all judges strive to maintain in their professional and personal lives. While the overarching principles that guide the judiciary are largely immutable, evolving expectations of the public, societal developments and new understandings of issues relevant to the judiciary will serve to constantly inform the interpretation of Ethical Principles in the future.

Introduction

Objet

1. Les Principes de déontologie judiciaire [Principes de déontologie] offrent des conseils d'ordre déontologique aux juges de nomination fédérale. Ce faisant, ils expriment une vision de ce que cela représente que d'être un juge. Le rôle des juges est défini par les principes d'indépendance, d'intégrité et de respect, de diligence et de compétence, d'égalité et d'impartialité. Les Principes de déontologie se veulent l'expression des idéaux d'ordre déontologique les plus élevés auxquels aspirent les juges, au service de la justice et de la primauté du droit; c'est l'intention que devraient y lire les juges et le public.

2. Piliers fondamentaux de la gouvernance démocratique, de la primauté du droit et de la justice, l'indépendance et l'impartialité de la magistrature sont des droits reconnus à chacun. Toute personne doit et mérite d'être entendue par des juges impartiaux, compétents et respectueux. Tous les membres de la magistrature s'engagent à exercer leur charge de manière à préserver la confiance du public. Les recommandations qui suivent exposent les normes d'ordre déontologique élevées que les juges s'efforcent d'observer dans leurs fonctions professionnelles et dans leur vie personnelle. Si les grands principes qui guident les juges demeurent largement immuables, en revanche les attentes du public, la société elle-même et notre compréhension des questions qui touchent la fonction judiciaire évoluent, et cette évolution éclairera de façon constante l'interprétation des Principes de déontologie à l'avenir.

3. A judge must be and be seen to be free to decide honestly and impartially on the basis of the law and the evidence, without external pressure or influence and without fear of interference from anyone. Nothing in Ethical Principles can or is intended to limit or restrict this judicial independence in any manner. Judges have the duty to uphold and defend judicial independence, not as a privilege of judicial office but as the constitutionally guaranteed right of everyone to have their disputes heard and decided in a fair way by impartial and independent judges.

4. The ethical principles articulated in this document are aspirational. They are not intended to be a code of conduct that sets minimum standards. They are advisory in nature and are designed to (i) describe exemplary behaviour which all judges strive to maintain; (ii) assist judges with the difficult ethical and professional issues that confront them; and (iii) help members of the public better understand the judicial role. The guidance provided in Ethical Principles does not preclude reasonable disagreements about their application in particular cases or imply that any departure from them necessarily warrants disapproval. The ethical principles are intended to be applied in light of all of the relevant circumstances and consistently with the requirements of judicial independence and the law. They should not be viewed as an exhaustive expression of the ethical considerations that judges may face in their professional or personal lives.

3. Les juges doivent être libres et paraître libres de juger avec intégrité et impartialité sur le seul fondement du droit et de la preuve présentée, sans pressions ni influences extérieures et sans crainte d'ingérence de la part de qui que ce soit. Les Principes de déontologie ne sauraient limiter ou restreindre en aucune façon cette indépendance de la magistrature et ils ne visent pas à le faire. Les juges sont tenus de soutenir et de défendre l'indépendance de la magistrature, non parce qu'elle constitue un privilège rattaché à leur charge, mais parce que la Constitution garantit à quiconque le droit de voir son litige entendu et tranché de façon équitable par des juges impartiaux et indépendants.

4. Les principes d'ordre déontologique exposés dans ce document articulent un idéal à atteindre. Ils ne constituent pas un code de conduite imposant des normes minimales à suivre. Ce sont des recommandations ayant pour objectif (i) de décrire la conduite exemplaire que les juges s'efforcent d'observer; (ii) d'aider les juges à résoudre les épineuses questions d'ordre déontologique et professionnel auxquelles ils sont confrontés; et (iii) d'aider les membres du public à mieux comprendre la fonction judiciaire. Il n'est pas exclu que les recommandations énoncées dans les Principes de déontologie puissent faire l'objet d'interprétations divergentes raisonnables quant à leur application dans un cas donné; de plus, le fait d'énoncer ces recommandations n'implique pas qu'il y aurait nécessairement matière à réprobation si on s'en écartait. Les principes de déontologie doivent être appliqués au regard de toutes les circonstances pertinentes ainsi qu'en conformité avec le principe de l'indépendance de la magistrature et avec le droit. On ne saurait y voir l'énumération complète des questions éthiques auxquelles les juges peuvent faire face dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions ou dans leur vie personnelle.

Context

5. The Canadian Judicial Council [the CJC] has been attentive to judicial ethics for decades. It published Commentaries on Judicial Conduct in 1991. This was followed by Ethical Principles for Judges [Ethical Principles 1998]. It provided ethical guidance to judges aligned with a set of central principles and better informed the public about the high ideals which judges embrace and toward which they strive. While drawing heavily on existing resources, Ethical Principles 1998 was the most comprehensive treatment of the subject at that time in Canada. Further, it was uniquely the work of Canadian judges. An extensive process of consultation within the judiciary and beyond ensured that Ethical Principles 1998 was the subject of painstaking examination and vigorous debate. The intention was that Canadian judges would accept Ethical Principles 1998 as reflective of their high ethical aspirations and would find it worthy of respect and deserving of careful consideration when facing ethical issues

Contexte

5. Le Conseil canadien de la magistrature [le Conseil] s'intéresse aux questions de déontologie judiciaire depuis des décennies. En 1991, il a publié des Commentaires sur la conduite des juges. Puis, a suivi les Principes de déontologie judiciaire [Principes de déontologie de 1998] qui a proposé un ensemble de principes fondamentaux pour guider les juges sur des questions d'ordre déontologique et mieux renseigner le public sur les normes élevées auxquelles les juges adhèrent et qu'ils s'efforcent d'observer. Les Principes de déontologie de 1998, qui puisaient abondamment aux sources existantes, représentaient néanmoins l'exposé le plus complet en cette matière jamais publié au Canada. De plus, ils étaient entièrement le fruit du travail de juges canadiens. De vastes consultations menées auprès de la magistrature et du public avaient permis de soumettre les Principes de déontologie de 1998 à un examen minutieux et à un débat vigoureux. Cette démarche avait pour but d'assurer que les juges du Canada verraient dans les Principes de déontologie de 1998 le reflet de leurs aspirations élevées en matière de déontologie, qu'ils les considéreraient comme un document digne de respect et leur accorderaient une attention soutenue lorsqu'ils seraient confrontés à des questions d'ordre déontologique.

6. Over the past twenty years Ethical Principles 1998 has provided valuable ethical guidance to federally appointed judges in a broad range of complex circumstances. It has become a crucial resource in the training provided to judges upon appointment, and forms part of ongoing discussions in professional development settings throughout a judge's career. In addition, the publication of Ethical Principles 1998 coincided with the establishment of an Advisory Committee on Judicial Ethics [Advisory Committee] to which specific ethical questions have been submitted by judges. The Advisory Committee continues to respond to these queries with advisory opinions that contribute to the ongoing review and elaboration of the subjects dealt with in Ethical Principles 1998. These opinions may also identify new issues that this version of Ethical Principles does not directly address. The Advisory Committee continues to ensure that help is readily available to judges looking for guidance.

6. Depuis deux décennies, les Principes de déontologie de 1998 ont fourni aux juges de nomination fédérale des conseils précieux en matière déontologique dans un éventail de situations complexes. Les Principes de déontologie sont au cœur de la formation offerte aux juges à la suite de leur nomination, et ils sont examinés et discutés dans les programmes de perfectionnement professionnel auxquels participent les juges tout au long de leur carrière. Par ailleurs, la publication des Principes de déontologie de 1998 a coïncidé avec la création d'un comité consultatif sur la déontologie judiciaire [le Comité consultatif] auquel les juges soumettent depuis des questions précises touchant la déontologie. Les avis que le Comité consultatif fournit en réponse à ces demandes contribuent à l'examen et à l'approfondissement continus des questions traitées dans les Principes de déontologie de 1998. Ils peuvent également contribuer à mettre en lumière des problèmes qui ne sont pas abordés directement dans la présente version des Principes de déontologie. Le Comité consultatif continue de veiller à ce que les juges qui recherchent des conseils puissent aisément recevoir de l'aide.

7. A document of this nature can never be viewed as the "final word" on such an important and complex subject. After more than twenty years from its initial publication, Ethical Principles 1998 needed modernization to address significant societal changes, changes in the role of the judiciary, and the social context in which judges serve. In 2016, the revision of Ethical Principles 1998 was commenced by the Judicial Independence and Appointment Process Committee of the CJC [Independence Committee], with input from Chief Justices and puisne judges from across Canada. As was done in 1998, broad consultations were conducted within the judiciary and beyond to ensure that Ethical Principles is responsive to the needs of judges and takes community expectations into account. The consultations included an on-line survey of issues relevant to judicial ethics and a series of meetings and dialogue with organizations representing the judiciary and other interested parties. Once a draft document was prepared it was made public and judges, judges' organizations, other professional organizations and members of the public were invited to provide comments and feedback. Throughout the project, the Independence Committee reviewed every submission and every proposed amendment, and incorporated into the final version of Ethical Principles many of the proposals and suggestions submitted to it.

7. De par sa nature, un document comme celui-ci ne saurait prétendre apporter une réponse définitive sur un sujet aussi important et complexe. Plus de vingt ans après leur publication, les Principes de déontologie de 1998 étaient mûrs pour une mise à jour qui permette de traiter d'enjeux importants soulevés par l'évolution de la société, de la fonction judiciaire et du contexte social dans lequel les juges s'acquittent de leur charge. À partir de 2016, le Comité sur l'indépendance judiciaire et le processus de nomination du Conseil [Comité sur l'indépendance] s'est attelé à la tâche de réviser les Principes de déontologie de 1998, avec l'apport des juges en chef et des juges puînés de partout au Canada. Comme ce fut le cas en 1998, de vastes consultations ont été menées au sein de la magistrature et auprès du public afin que les Principes de déontologie répondent aux besoins des juges et tiennent compte des attentes du public. Ces consultations ont compris, entre autres, un sondage en ligne sur des questions de déontologie judiciaire, de même qu'une série de rencontres et d'échanges avec des organisations représentant la magistrature et d'autres parties intéressées. L'ébauche rédigée à la suite de ces consultations a été rendue publique, et les juges, les associations qui les représentent, des organismes professionnels et les membres du public ont été invités à présenter des commentaires. Tout au long du projet, le Comité sur l'indépendance s'est penché sur chacun des commentaires reçus et chacune des modifications proposées et a intégré dans la version définitive des Principes de déontologie bon nombre des propositions et suggestions qui lui avaient été soumises.

8. Today, judges' work includes case management, settlement conferences, judicial mediation, and frequent interaction with self-represented litigants. These responsibilities invite further consideration with respect to ethical guidance. In the same manner, the digital age, the phenomenon of social media, the importance of professional development for judges and the transition to post-judicial roles all raise ethical issues that were not fully considered twenty years ago. Judges are expected to be alert to the history, experience and circumstances of Canada's Indigenous peoples, and to the diversity of cultures and communities that make up this country. In this spirit, the judiciary is now more actively involved with the wider public, both to enhance public confidence and to expand its own knowledge of the diversity of human experiences in Canada today.

9. The format of Ethical Principles 1998 is preserved. Each chapter is organized hierarchically, beginning with a Statement, followed by a set of Principles and then a series of Commentaries aligned with each Principle. At the highest level of abstraction, each Statement expresses a fundamental value or theme of judicial ethics. The Principles identify components of each Statement and articulate behaviours that would constitute the highest aspirations of an ethical judge with respect to that Principle. With occasional exceptions, the Statements and Principles are stated in 'declarative' language – essentially statements of what an ethical judge does or how an ethical judge acts, consistent with the goal of describing the attributes of an ethical judge. The Commentaries associated with each Principle provide explanations, context and further elucidation of the Principles, almost always in aspirational language, often using concrete examples.

8. De nos jours, les responsabilités des juges s'étendent à la gestion des instances ainsi qu'aux conférences de règlement et aux séances de médiation judiciaires. De plus, il arrive fréquemment que les juges doivent interagir avec des parties non représentées. Ces responsabilités appellent une nouvelle réflexion sur le soutien à apporter en matière déontologique. Parallèlement, d'autres phénomènes soulèvent des enjeux déontologiques qui n'avaient pas été pleinement considérés il y a vingt ans : l'arrivée de l'ère numérique, l'émergence des médias sociaux, l'importance du perfectionnement professionnel des juges et le passage de certains de ceux-ci à une autre carrière après leur départ de la magistrature. On attend des juges qu'ils soient sensibles et au fait de l'histoire, du vécu et de la réalité des peuples autochtones au Canada, ainsi que de la diversité des cultures et des communautés qui composent le pays. C'est dans cet esprit que la magistrature joue un rôle plus actif qu'auparavant auprès du public, aussi bien pour soutenir la confiance que le public accorde à la magistrature que pour approfondir sa connaissance de la diversité des expériences humaines au Canada.

9. L'organisation générale des matières établie dans les Principes de déontologie de 1998 a été préservée. Structuré de façon hiérarchique, chaque chapitre commence par un Énoncé, suivi par des Principes auxquels succèdent une série de Commentaires liés à chacun des Principes. L'Énoncé exprime une valeur ou un thème fondamental de la déontologie judiciaire, à un niveau élevé d'abstraction. Les Principes exposent les éléments qui découlent de l'Énoncé et décrivent la conduite idéale vers laquelle tendrait le juge éthique au regard de ceux-ci. En règle générale, les Énoncés et les Principes sont rédigés de manière déclarative, énonçant essentiellement ce que fait un juge éthique ou comment il agit, l'objectif étant de décrire la conduite exemplaire d'un juge éthique. Quant aux Commentaires, ils servent à expliquer les Principes et à les mettre en contexte, presque toujours sous la forme de recommandations, et présentent souvent des exemples concrets.

10. When an ethical issue arises for a judge more than one principle may be relevant. The approach taken in Ethical Principles is to discuss the aspects of each Principle discretely, recognizing that multiple Principles and chapters of Ethical Principles may need to be considered in obtaining comprehensive guidance in the resolution of the ethical issue. The comprehensive Index, as well as links within electronic versions of Ethical Principles, will enable the reader to identify and access associated Principles and Commentaries.

11. The language adopted in this edition of Ethical Principles provides greater consistency of meaning between the English and French versions. Ethical Principles was co-drafted in English and French and each version is equally authoritative. As well, the document is written in gender-neutral language. Whenever pronouns are used, they are intended to be inclusive of all genders.

12. This edition of Ethical Principles also addresses circumstances associated with judges contemplating or undertaking post-judicial legal careers. In particular, it discusses unique ethical issues that may arise in the transition to post-judicial legal careers and those that continue after judges leave office. This guidance is provided to present and former judges for their benefit and with a view to maintaining public confidence in the judiciary.

10. Lorsqu'un juge fait face à une question d'ordre déontologique, il se peut que plus d'un principe entre en jeu. L'approche retenue dans les Principes de déontologie consiste à aborder de façon distincte les différents aspects de chaque principe; il est donc possible qu'il faille considérer plusieurs principes et consulter plus d'un chapitre des Principes de déontologie pour obtenir des conseils sur l'ensemble des éléments permettant de résoudre une question. L'index détaillé et les hyperliens insérés dans les versions électroniques des Principes de déontologie permettront au lecteur de repérer les principes pertinents et les commentaires qui s'y rapportent, et d'y accéder facilement.

11. La présente édition des Principes de déontologie assure une meilleure harmonisation des versions française et anglaise. Les Principes de déontologie ont fait l'objet d'une corédaction, et les versions anglaise et française ont la même valeur. De plus, le présent document est rédigé sans distinction de genre. L'utilisation d'un genre inclut tous les genres.

12. La présente édition des Principes de déontologie traite également de la situation des juges qui envisagent ou amorcent une nouvelle carrière après leur départ de la magistrature. Ainsi, elle examine certaines des questions particulières qui sont susceptibles de se poser sur le plan déontologique à l'occasion du passage à une nouvelle carrière, ainsi que les principes qui continuent de s'appliquer après le départ de la magistrature. Ces conseils s'adressent aussi bien aux juges en poste qu'aux anciens juges et visent à préserver la confiance du public envers la magistrature.

I. Judicial Independence

Statement

An independent judiciary is indispensable to impartial justice under law. Judges uphold and exemplify judicial independence in both its individual and institutional aspects.

Principles

A. Judges exercise their judicial functions independently and free of extraneous influence.

B. Judges firmly reject improper attempts to influence their decisions in any matter before the court.

C. Judges exhibit and promote high standards of judicial conduct so as to reinforce public confidence in the independence of the judiciary.

D. Judges encourage and uphold arrangements and safeguards to maintain and enhance the institutional and administrative independence of the judiciary.

I. Indépendance de la magistrature

Énoncé

L'indépendance de la magistrature est indispensable à l'exercice d'une justice impartiale sous un régime de droit. Les juges soutiennent l'indépendance de la magistrature et l'incarnent tant dans ses éléments individuels qu'institutionnels.

Principes

A. Les juges exercent leurs fonctions judiciaires de façon indépendante, à l'abri de toute influence extérieure.

B. Dans les affaires dont la cour est saisie, les juges repoussent fermement toute tentative inappropriée visant à influencer leur décision.

C. Les juges observent des normes élevées de conduite judiciaire et en favorisent l'application, afin de renforcer la confiance du public envers l'indépendance de la magistrature.

D. Les juges encouragent et soutiennent les mesures et les garanties qui visent à préserver et à accroître l'indépendance de la magistrature, tant sur le plan institutionnel qu'administratif.

Commentary

General

1.A.1 Judicial independence refers to the liberty and responsibility of judges to hear and decide cases that come before them in accordance with their conscience, without interference from others. The guarantee of judicial independence aims to make judges impervious to improper external intervention in the exercise of their functions. Judges are, and must reasonably be perceived to be, independent, both individually and institutionally. Judicial independence is not the private right of judges. It is the foundation of judicial impartiality and a constitutional right of all. The right to be tried by an independent and impartial tribunal is an integral principle of fundamental justice protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

1.A.2 Judges are called upon to resolve a wide array of disputes and generally to determine legal rights and obligations. Public confidence in the judiciary rests on the fact that their decisions are made according to law.

1.A.3 Judicial independence refers to a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions. It also connotes a status or relationship with others, including the executive branch of government and other judges. Judicial independence is the foundation for impartial decision-making. The first qualification of a judge is the ability to make independent and impartial decisions. Judges apply the law without fear or favour and without regard to whether the decision is popular. This is a cornerstone of the rule of law, and it is secured through respect for the principle of judicial independence.

Commentaires

Général

1.A.1 L'indépendance judiciaire s'entend de la liberté et de la responsabilité du juge d'instruire et de trancher une affaire donnée selon sa conscience, sans l'intervention d'autres personnes. La garantie d'indépendance judiciaire vise à rendre les juges imperméables aux interventions extérieures indues dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions. Les juges sont indépendants et doivent être raisonnablement perçus comme tels, tant sur le plan individuel que sur le plan institutionnel. L'indépendance judiciaire n'est pas un droit qui appartient en propre à chaque juge. Elle constitue le fondement de l'impartialité judiciaire et est un droit constitutionnel qui appartient à chacun. Le droit d'être jugé par un tribunal indépendant et impartial est un principe essentiel de justice fondamentale garanti par la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés de la personne.

1.A.2 Il incombe aux juges de trancher une large gamme de litiges et, de manière générale, de déterminer les droits et obligations juridiques. La confiance du public envers la magistrature s'appuie sur le fait que les décisions des juges sont rendues en fonction du droit.

1.A.3 L'indépendance judiciaire désigne un état d'esprit ou une attitude dans l'exercice concret des fonctions judiciaires. Elle connote aussi un statut ou une relation à l'égard d'autrui, y compris le pouvoir exécutif et les autres juges. L'indépendance judiciaire est le fondement permettant la prise de décisions impartiales. La qualité première du juge réside dans sa capacité de rendre des décisions de manière indépendante et impartiale. Les juges appliquent la loi, sans crainte de représailles ni favoritisme, et indépendamment de l'accueil, favorable ou non, de leur décision. C'est là une des pierres angulaires de la primauté du droit, garantie par le respect du principe d'indépendance de la magistrature.

1.A.4 Judicial independence is fundamental to ensuring that decisions are made without external influence and to maintaining individual and public confidence in the administration of justice. Preserving the constituent elements of judicial independence is critical to the public's perception of the impartiality of judges. In that sense, judicial independence is an important means to a fundamental end. Judicial independence ensures that judges are impartial in fact, and also that they are perceived to be so.

1.A.5 Judges protect judicial independence not for their own benefit but for the benefits of all Canadians. Solely self-interested claims for judicial independence risk undermining public confidence in the judiciary.

1.A.6 Informing the public with respect to the role of the judiciary and judicial independence is an important judicial function. It is in the public interest for judges to take advantage of appropriate opportunities to enhance the public's understanding of the fundamental importance of judicial independence.

Avoiding and Rejecting Improper Influence

1.B.1 Judges should avoid all communications with anyone external to a case that might raise reasonable concerns about judicial independence. Judges must firmly reject improper attempts to influence their decisions. Communications intended to influence a specific judicial decision can only be received within the judicial process.

1.A.4 L'indépendance de la magistrature est fondamentale afin d'assurer que les décisions sont rendues sans influence extérieure et de soutenir la confiance individuelle et collective dans l'administration de la justice. Le maintien des conditions de l'indépendance de la magistrature est essentiel à la perception qu'a le public de l'impartialité des juges. En ce sens, l'indépendance de la magistrature constitue un moyen crucial d'atteindre cet objectif fondamental. L'indépendance de la magistrature garantit l'impartialité objective des juges et fait en sorte qu'ils soient perçus comme des personnes impartiales.

1.A.5 Les jugent protègent l'indépendance de la magistrature dans l'intérêt de tous, et non par intérêt personnel. Revendiquer la protection de l'indépendance de la magistrature par pur intérêt personnel risquerait de miner la confiance du public à l'endroit des juges.

1.A.6 L'une des fonctions importantes des juges consiste à renseigner le public sur le rôle de la magistrature et sur son indépendance. Il est dans l'intérêt public que les juges profitent d'occasions appropriées pour aider le public à mieux comprendre l'importance fondamentale de l'indépendance de la magistrature.

Éviter et repousser les tentatives d'influence indue

1.B.1 Les juges devraient éviter toute communication – avec quiconque est étranger à l'affaire dont ils sont saisis – qui pourrait soulever des craintes raisonnables en ce qui concerne l'indépendance de la magistrature. Les juges doivent fermement repousser toute tentative inappropriée d'influencer leurs décisions. Les communications ayant pour objet d'influencer une décision dans une affaire donnée doivent s'inscrire dans le cadre du processus judiciaire.

1.B.2 Attempts to influence judges may come from many sources, including social media. Judges should be cautious in their communications on social media relating to matters that could come before the court. Also, their social media activities should be undertaken in ways that avoid compromising public confidence in the judiciary.

Public Confidence

1.C.1 Judicial independence and judicial ethics are interrelated. Judges should exemplify and promote high standards of judicial conduct as one element of assuring the independence of the judiciary. In turn, the independence and integrity of the judiciary preserves public confidence in the rule of law and acceptance of court decisions. Unethical conduct by judges erodes that confidence. Thus, judges share a collective responsibility to promote and observe high standards of conduct.

Institutional and Administrative Independence

1.D.1 Judicial independence is secured by institutional and operational structures that protect judges and courts from external influence so that judicial decisions are made according to law in a fair process. For example, judges have security of tenure and their remuneration is set through an independent process so that neither fear of sanction nor hope of reward stands in the way of rendering justice. For the same reasons, judges also have immunity from liability in relation to their decisions.

Confiance du public

1.C.1 L'indépendance judiciaire et le respect des principes déontologiques sont interdépendants. Les juges devraient observer des normes de conduite élevées contribuant à assurer l'indépendance de la magistrature et en favoriser l'application. En retour, l'indépendance et l'intégrité des juges préservent la confiance du public dans la primauté du droit et l'acceptation par celui-ci des décisions des tribunaux. Une conduite contraire à l'éthique de la part d'un juge mine cette confiance. C'est pourquoi les juges ont la responsabilité collective de favoriser et d'observer des normes de conduite élevées.

Indépendance institutionnelle et administrative

1.D.1 L'indépendance de la magistrature est garantie par des structures institutionnelles et opérationnelles qui protègent les juges et les tribunaux contre toute influence extérieure afin qu'ils puissent rendre leurs décisions judiciaires conformément au droit, dans le cadre d'un processus équitable. Ainsi, afin d'assurer que ni la crainte d'une sanction ni l'espoir d'un gain ne puissent nuire à l'application juste du droit, les juges sont inamovibles et leur rémunération est déterminée dans le cadre d'un processus indépendant. Pour les mêmes raisons, les juges jouissent d'une immunité contre les poursuites à l'égard des décisions qu'ils rendent.

1.D.2 In keeping with the principle of judicial independence, professional development for judges is organized, designed and delivered under the authority of the judiciary.

1.D.3 At an institutional level, courts require sufficient autonomy to guarantee that the administration of justice is free from any political or other improper influence.

1.D.4 The judiciary should remain vigilant with respect to any initiative that may have the effect of undermining its institutional or administrative independence. That said, not every proposed change in the administrative arrangements affecting the judiciary constitutes a threat to judicial independence.

1.D.2 Afin de préserver le principe de l'indépendance de la magistrature, les programmes de perfectionnement professionnel destinés aux juges sont organisés, élaborés et prodigués sous l'égide de la magistrature.

1.D.3 Au niveau institutionnel, les tribunaux ont besoin d'une autonomie suffisante pour garantir que l'administration de la justice est libre de toute influence indue, notamment politique.

1.D.4 La magistrature devrait rester à l'affût de toute tentative susceptible de miner son indépendance institutionnelle ou administrative. Cela dit, ce ne sont pas tous les changements qu'on propose d'apporter aux dispositions administratives affectant les juges qui constituent une menace pour l'indépendance judiciaire.

II. Integrity and Respect

Statement

Judges conduct themselves respectfully and with integrity so as to sustain and enhance public confidence in the judiciary.

Principles

A. Judges comply with the law and conduct themselves both inside and outside the courtroom in a manner that is above reproach in the view of reasonable and informed persons.

B. Judges are discreet and do not use or disclose confidential information acquired in their judicial capacity for any purpose not related to judicial duties.

C. Judges treat everyone with civility and respect in the performance of their judicial duties.

D. Judges foster access to justice for all. Judges carry out their duties with appropriate consideration for all the parties, whether or not they are represented, and ensure that they are treated fairly and respectfully, so as to provide them with reasonable access to court processes.

E. Judges avoid all forms of harassment and abuse of authority or status.

F. Judges do not allow their status or the prestige of judicial office to be used to advance a private interest.

G. Judges encourage and support the observance of Ethical Principles by their judicial colleagues.

II. Intégrité et respect

Énoncé

Les juges font preuve, dans leur conduite, de respect et d'intégrité de façon à soutenir et à renforcer la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature.

Principes

A. Les juges se conforment au droit et adoptent, tant à l'intérieur qu'à l'extérieur de la salle d'audience, une conduite irréprochable aux yeux d'une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée.

B. Les juges font preuve de discrétion et n'utilisent ni ne divulguent les renseignements confidentiels acquis dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires, si ce n'est pour une fin liée à ces fonctions.

C. Les juges traitent toutes les personnes avec courtoisie et respect dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

D. Les juges favorisent l'accès à la justice. Dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions, les juges accordent la considération appropriée à toutes les parties, représentées et non représentées, et veillent à ce qu'elles soient traitées avec équité et respect, afin de leur assurer un accès raisonnable aux processus judiciaires.

E. Les juges évitent toute forme de harcèlement et d'abus d'autorité ou de statut.

F. Les juges ne permettent pas que leur statut ou le prestige de la fonction judiciaire soit utilisé au profit d'un intérêt privé.

G. Les juges encouragent et soutiennent le respect des Principes de déontologie par leurs collègues de la magistrature.

Commentary

General

2.A.1 Public confidence in the judiciary is essential to an effective judicial system and, ultimately, the rule of law. Within that system, judges hold positions of significant trust, confidence and responsibility. Conduct, in and out of court, that exhibits integrity ensures public respect for and confidence in the individual judge and, more significantly, contributes to public confidence in the judiciary and the judicial system as a whole. Judges should therefore act with a high degree of decorum, propriety and humanity.

2.A.2 Public expectations of the integrity of judges are understandably high. Behaviour considered acceptable if exhibited by some members of the public may not be appropriate for members of the judiciary. Judges should therefore be mindful of the ways in which their conduct would be perceived by reasonable and informed members of the community and whether that perception is likely to lessen respect for the judge or the judiciary as a whole. Behaviour that would diminish that respect in the minds of such persons should be avoided.

Behaviour in Private Life

2.A.3. Public expectations of judges are not limited to the actions of judges in their judicial capacities. Judges should exhibit respect for the law and act with integrity in their private lives and should avoid the appearance of impropriety.

Commentaires

Général

2.A.1 La confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature est essentielle au bon fonctionnement du système de justice et, en définitive, à la primauté du droit. Les juges occupent une position de grande confiance et de responsabilité au sein de ce système. Les juges qui adoptent, en salle d'audience ou ailleurs, une conduite empreinte d'intégrité s'assurent du respect et de la confiance du public et, surtout, contribuent à soutenir la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature et du système de justice tout entier. Les juges devraient en conséquence se conduire avec décorum, décence et humanité.

2.A.2 Les attentes du public à l'égard de l'intégrité des juges sont bien entendu élevées. Les comportements qu'on jugerait acceptables pour un membre du public pourraient ne pas convenir à un membre de la magistrature. Les juges devraient donc être conscients de la perception que des personnes raisonnables et bien renseignées pourraient avoir de leur conduite et de la possibilité que cette perception diminue le respect dont jouissent les juges individuellement et la magistrature dans son ensemble. Tout comportement qui porterait atteinte à ce respect dans l'esprit de ces personnes est à proscrire.

Le comportement dans la vie privée

2.A.3 Les attentes du public à l'endroit des juges ne se limitent pas aux actes que ces derniers posent dans l'exercice de leur charge. Les juges devraient faire montre de leur respect pour la loi, agir avec intégrité dans leur vie personnelle et éviter toute apparence d'inconduite.

2.A.4 After appointment, judges are not required to withdraw from the world. They may lead a normal life in the community, while retaining a sense of the dignity of judicial office and realizing that the public expects virtually irreproachable conduct from judges.

2.A.5 A judge's conduct, in and out of court, may be the subject of public scrutiny and comment. At the same time, judges have private lives and are entitled to enjoy, as much as possible, the rights and freedoms generally available to all. Nevertheless, judges accept some restrictions on their activities — even activities that would not elicit adverse notice if carried out by other members of the community. For example, judges should exercise caution in their use of social media. Judges should strive to strike a balance between the expectations of judicial office and their personal lives. In finding this balance, judges should be guided by these Ethical Principles.

2.A.4 Les juges ne sont pas tenus de se tenir à l'écart du monde après leur nomination. Ils peuvent participer à la vie de leur collectivité, tout en gardant à l'esprit la dignité rattachée à leur charge et le fait que le public s'attend à une conduite quasi irréprochable de la part des juges.

2.A.5 La conduite des juges, en salle d'audience ou ailleurs, peut être soumise à l'examen attentif et à la critique du public. Par ailleurs, les juges ont aussi une vie privée et jouissent, dans toute la mesure du possible, des mêmes droits et libertés que ceux qui sont conférés aux autres personnes de manière générale. Néanmoins, les juges acceptent certaines restrictions à l'égard de leurs activités — même celles qui ne susciteraient aucune critique si elles étaient le fait d'autres membres de la collectivité. Par exemple, les juges devraient utiliser les médias sociaux avec prudence. Ils devraient s'efforcer de maintenir l'équilibre entre les attentes associées à leur charge et la conduite de leur vie personnelle. Les Principes de déontologie peuvent les guider à cet égard.

Confidentiality and Discretion[1]

2.B.1 Judges are entrusted with preserving confidentiality. The performance of judicial duties necessarily entails that judges receive or come into possession of confidential information. While justice is, in principle, transparent, open and public, some of the facts, documents, records and circumstances of a dispute may be subject to confidentiality orders, including the identity of one or more parties. Judges should not use or reveal confidential information except where, in the performance of their judicial duties, such disclosure is necessary, or done in accordance with relevant rules on archiving and disclosure. When judges work as a group, their internal discussions remain confidential.

2.B.2 Judges should be discreet when discussing their work, including in contexts in which what they say may be inadvertently overheard by others.

2.B.3 Confidentiality and discretion extend past a judge's departure from judicial office.

Civility and Respect

2.C.1 A hallmark of judicial proceedings is that all participants, including judges, will conduct themselves in a manner that preserves the honour and dignity of both the individual proceedings and the administration of justice more generally. Judges should endeavor to treat all participants in the judicial process with civility and respect.

1 Canadian Judicial Council, Use of Personal Information in Judgments and Recommended Protocol (2005)

Confidentialité et discrétion[1]

2.B.1 Les juges sont les gardiens de la confidentialité. L'exercice des fonctions judiciaires a pour conséquence que les juges, inévitablement, reçoivent des renseignements de nature confidentielle ou entrent en possession de tels renseignements. Même si, en principe, la justice est publique, ouverte et transparente, certains faits, documents, dossiers ou circonstances entourant un litige, y compris l'identité d'une ou de plusieurs parties, peuvent être assujettis à des ordonnances de confidentialité. Les juges ne devraient jamais utiliser ou révéler des renseignements de nature confidentielle, sauf lorsque cela est nécessaire dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires, ou conformément aux règles applicables qui régissent l'archivage et la divulgation. Lorsqu'ils travaillent en groupe, leurs discussions demeurent confidentielles.

2.B.2 Les juges devraient faire preuve de discrétion lorsqu'ils discutent de leur travail, y compris dans des contextes où leurs propos peuvent être entendus par inadvertance.

2.B.3 La confidentialité et la discrétion demeurent importantes pour les juges même après leur départ de la magistrature.

Courtoisie et respect

2.C.1 L'une des caractéristiques du processus judiciaire est que toutes les personnes qui y participent, y compris les juges, se comportent de manière à préserver l'honneur et la dignité tant des instances individuelles que de l'administration de la justice en général. Les juges devraient s'efforcer de traiter chaque personne qui intervient dans le processus judiciaire avec courtoisie et respect.

1 Conseil canadien de la magistrature, L'usage de renseignements personnels dans les jugements et protocole recommandé (2005)

2.C.2 The commitment of judges to civility and respect is not limited to judicial proceedings. Judges should attempt, in all of their engagements with others, including their judicial colleagues, to act in accordance with these values. By showing dignified consideration for others, judges enhance public respect for and confidence in the judiciary as an institution.

2.C.3 The circumstances of some cases and the conduct of counsel and parties sometimes require judges to act with an appropriate measure of firmness and to emphasize decisiveness, promptness, the prevention of abuse of process or improper treatment of participants in the adjudicative process. Maintaining civility and respect requires judges to ensure a proper balance between upholding the right of parties to be heard and ensuring the efficiency of the process.

2.C.4 It is often necessary for judges in the adjudication process to make findings of credibility and to rule on the propriety of a person's conduct. That being said, in court proceedings or in their judgments, judges should not make inappropriate remarks about a person's conduct or motives. Furthermore, judges should not make comments about persons who are not before the court unless, in the judge's opinion, it is necessary for the proper disposition of the case.

2.C.5 Judges should be alert to the possibility that ill-considered, comical or facetious remarks, often made spontaneously and intended to be humorous, may give offence or diminish the dignity of the proceedings.

2.C.2 Cet engagement des juges envers la courtoisie et le respect ne se limite pas au processus judiciaire. Les juges devraient s'efforcer de respecter ces valeurs dans tous leurs rapports avec autrui, y compris les autres membres de la magistrature. Les juges contribuent au respect de la magistrature et à la confiance que le public lui accorde en tant qu'institution en se comportant de manière digne et respectueuse avec autrui.

2.C.3 Les aspects particuliers d'une affaire et la conduite des avocats et des parties peut parfois obliger les juges à utiliser une certaine fermeté et à privilégier l'efficacité dans la prise de décision, la célérité ainsi que la prévention des abus de procédure et des comportements répréhensibles envers les participants au processus judiciaire. Le maintien d'une attitude courtoise et respectueuse exige des juges qu'ils préservent un juste équilibre entre le droit des parties d'être entendues et l'efficacité du processus.

2.C.4 Il arrive souvent aux juges de devoir se prononcer sur la crédibilité ou la conduite de certaines personnes pour trancher un litige. Cela étant, les juges devraient s'abstenir, au cours du processus judiciaire ou dans leurs jugements, de formuler des commentaires inappropriés concernant la conduite d'une personne ou ses motivations. Les juges devraient aussi s'abstenir de formuler des commentaires concernant des personnes qui ne comparaissent pas devant le tribunal, à moins que cela ne soit nécessaire au règlement de l'affaire du point de vue du juge.

2.C.5 Les juges devraient être sensibles au fait que les commentaires inconsidérés, humoristiques ou facétieux, qui sont souvent formulés spontanément et se veulent drôles, peuvent être offensants et miner la dignité des procédures.

2.C.6 It is a delicate question whether and in what circumstances a judge should report, or cause to be reported, a lawyer's conduct to the lawyer's professional governing body. Taking such action may affect the ability of the judge to continue in the proceeding in which that lawyer is appearing, given that the judge's view of the lawyer's conduct may give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias against the lawyer or the lawyer's client. On the other hand, a judge is in a special position to observe lawyers' conduct before the court. Judges should remain alert to the lawyer's legal and ethical duty of resolute advocacy on behalf of a client and commitment to the client's cause.
A judge should take, or cause to be taken, appropriate action where the judge becomes aware of misconduct by a lawyer or incompetence that seriously compromises the interests of justice. Where a judge intends to take action, the judge should follow court protocols and consider whether the interests of justice require that such action await the end of the proceeding or whether the circumstances require earlier action.

Access to Justice and Self-Represented Litigants[2]

2.D.1 Judges have a responsibility to promote and foster access to justice. In fulfilling their role, judges should be aware of the different ways in which disputes can be resolved fairly and efficiently.

2.C.6 La question de savoir si les juges devraient signaler ou faire signaler certains agissements d'un avocat à l'ordre professionnel de celui-ci, et dans quelles circonstances ils devraient le faire, est délicate. Les juges qui prennent ce genre de mesures risquent de ne plus être aptes à entendre la cause dans laquelle agit l'avocat dénoncé, puisque l'opinion exprimée sur la conduite de l'avocat peut susciter une crainte raisonnable quant à l'existence d'un parti pris contre l'avocat ou son client. Il reste que les juges occupent une position privilégiée pour observer la conduite des avocats devant le tribunal. Les juges devraient demeurer attentifs au fait que les avocats ont une obligation déontologique et légale de représenter leur client avec vigueur et de se dévouer à sa cause. Lorsque des juges sont témoins de l'inconduite d'un avocat ou d'une incompétence qui porte gravement atteinte à l'intérêt de la justice, ils devraient prendre ou faire prendre les mesures qui s'imposent conformément aux protocoles en vigueur dans leur cour s'il en est. Avant de prendre de telles mesures, les juges devraient déterminer si l'intérêt de la justice commande d'attendre la fin de l'audience ou si des circonstances spéciales justifient une action immédiate.

L'accès à la justice et les parties non représentées[2]

2.D.1 Les juges ont la responsabilité de promouvoir et de favoriser l'accès à la justice. Ce rôle impose aux juges d'être sensibles aux différents processus qui permettent une résolution juste et efficace des différends.

2 Canadian Judicial Council Statement of Principles on Self-represented Litigants and Accused Persons (2006)

2 Conseil canadien de la magistrature, Énoncé de principes concernant les plaideurs et les accusés non représentés par un avocat (2006)

2.D.2 Passive neutrality and treating everyone in the same manner may not always be appropriate. Parties often appear before the court as self-represented litigants. Judges should provide information and reasonable assistance, proactively where appropriate, on procedural and evidentiary rules, while being alert not to compromise judicial impartiality and the fairness of the proceeding.

Conduct Towards Others

2.E.1 The conduct of judges towards others is an important aspect of their commitment to integrity and respect. Judges should be attentive to the ways in which offensive remarks, or conduct, or inappropriate behaviour may adversely affect or intimidate others, particularly those in subordinate positions to the judge. A judge's conduct in this respect affects their individual reputation and that of the judiciary as a whole.

2.E.2 A common concern in the modern workplace is the possibility that authority may be used in inappropriate ways. The workplace of the judiciary is no exception. Judges refrain from any form of harassment in the workplace. It is also important for judges to avoid relationships with others with whom they work or associate that could be reasonably perceived as the judge taking advantage of their position or authority.

2.D.2 Il se pourrait que la neutralité passive et le traitement identique de toutes les parties ne soit pas toujours approprié. Il arrive souvent que des parties agissent devant les tribunaux sans être représentées. Les juges devraient informer les parties non représentées et leur fournir une aide raisonnable, de manière proactive lorsque les circonstances s'y prêtent, en ce qui concerne les règles de preuve et de procédure, tout en se gardant de compromettre leur impartialité et l'équité des procédures.

Comportement à l'égard d'autrui

2.E.1 La conduite des juges à l'égard d'autrui est un aspect important de leur engagement envers l'intégrité et le respect. Les juges devraient se montrer sensibles aux propos désobligeants et aux comportements offensants ou inappropriés qui pourraient atteindre ou intimider les personnes qu'ils côtoient, en particulier celles sur lesquelles s'exerce leur autorité. La conduite des juges à cet égard est susceptible d'affecter tant leur réputation individuelle que celle de la magistrature dans son ensemble.

Use of Status or Authority

2.F.1 Judges should not use their status or authority, or the status of their office, to seek, for themselves or others, an advantage or benefit to which they would not otherwise be entitled.

Fundraising

2.F.2 Judges should not allow the prestige of judicial office to be used in aid of fundraising for particular causes, however worthy. They should not solicit funds (except from judicial colleagues or from family members) or lend the prestige of their judicial office to such solicitations.

Letters of Reference

2.F.3 Judges may be called upon to provide letters of reference. It is important that the prestige of judicial office not be used to advance another person's private interests or create an impression that certain persons stand in a particular position of influence or favour with the judge. Factors for the judge to consider include whether: (i) providing the reference will not compromise the integrity of judicial office; (ii) it is the judge's personal knowledge of the individual that is called for; and (iii) the judge has an important perspective about the individual to contribute such that it would be unfair to the individual were the judge to refuse. Judges should keep in mind that letters of reference may be made public. Such letters may also be rendered inappropriate or inaccurate by a subsequent change in circumstances, thereby having the potential to reflect adversely on the judge or the judiciary. Judges may assist judicial appointment advisory committees on a confidential basis.

Statut et pouvoir judiciaire

2.F.1 Les juges ne devraient pas utiliser leur statut ou leur pouvoir, ou le prestige de leur fonction, pour rechercher un avantage ou un bénéfice, pour eux-mêmes ou pour autrui, qui ne pourrait être obtenu autrement.

Collecte de fonds

2.F.2 Les juges ne devraient pas permettre que le prestige de la fonction judiciaire contribue à la collecte de fonds pour des causes particulières, si méritoires soient-elles. Ils ne devraient pas recueillir de dons (sauf auprès de collègues juges ou auprès de membres de leur famille), ni associer le prestige de leur fonction à de telles collectes.

Lettres de recommandation

2.F.3 On demande parfois aux juges de fournir des lettres de recommandation. Il est important que le prestige de la fonction judiciaire ne serve pas à promouvoir les intérêts privés d'un tiers ou à donner l'impression que certaines personnes jouissent auprès d'eux d'une influence ou de faveurs particulières. Les facteurs que les juges devraient prendre en considération comprennent, notamment, les suivants : (i) le fait de fournir la recommandation ne mettra pas en péril l'intégrité de la fonction judiciaire; (ii) c'est à leur connaissance de la personne concernée que l'on fait appel; et (iii) lorsqu'ils ont un point de vue important à exprimer sur la personne concernée, un refus de leur part ne serait pas équitable envers cette personne. Les juges devraient garder à l'esprit que les lettres de recommandation peuvent être rendues publiques, que leur contenu peut devenir mal adapté ou inexact par suite d'un changement de circonstances et qu'elles sont donc susceptibles de nuire à leur image ou à celle de la magistrature. Les juges peuvent aider les comités consultatifs sur la nomination des juges de manière confidentielle.

Collegial Support

2.G.1 Judges should encourage and support their judicial colleagues' observance of ethical principles. Judges may become aware of circumstances that indicate a strong likelihood of unethical conduct by a judicial colleague. In such instances, judges should act in a manner that best ensures that action is taken to preserve public confidence in the administration of justice. Depending on the circumstances, such action may include communication with the Chief Justice of the court.

Soutien collégial

2.G.1 Les juges devraient encourager leurs collègues de la magistrature à respecter les principes de déontologie et les appuyer dans cette démarche. Il peut arriver que des juges soient informés de circonstances signalant une forte probabilité que la conduite d'un juge comporte des lacunes d'ordre déontologique. Dans ces cas, les juges devraient agir de manière à s'assurer que des mesures sont prises pour préserver la confiance du public dans l'administration de la justice. Selon la situation, de telles mesures pourraient inclure la divulgation du problème au juge en chef de la cour.

III. Diligence and Competence

Statement

Judges perform their duties with diligence and competence.

Principles

A. Judges devote themselves to their judicial duties, broadly defined, which include presiding in court and making decisions, as well as those duties essential to court operations and to the administration of justice. Judges do not engage in activities incompatible with the diligent discharge of judicial duties.

B. Judges perform all judicial duties, including the delivery of reserved judgments, with punctuality and reasonable promptness, having due regard to the urgency of the matter and other special circumstances.

C. Judges maintain and enhance their knowledge, skills, sensitivity to social context and the personal qualities necessary to perform their judicial duties.

D. Judges strive to maintain their wellness to optimize the performance of judicial duties.

III. Diligence et compétence

Énoncé

Les juges exercent leurs fonctions avec diligence et compétence.

Principes

A. Les juges se consacrent à leurs fonctions judiciaires, entendues au sens large, lesquelles englobent le fait de présider les audiences et de rendre des décisions, ainsi que celles qui sont essentielles au bon fonctionnement de leur tribunal et de l'administration de la justice. Les juges s'abstiennent de toute activité incompatible avec l'exercice diligent de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

B. Les juges exercent toutes leurs fonctions judiciaires, et rendent les jugements mis en délibéré, de façon ponctuelle et avec une célérité raisonnable, compte tenu des circonstances propres à chaque affaire, y compris leur caractère urgent.

C. Les juges maintiennent et améliorent les connaissances, les compétences, la sensibilité au contexte social et les qualités personnelles qui sont nécessaires à l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

D. Les juges s'efforcent de se maintenir en bonne santé afin d'exercer leurs fonctions judiciaires de manière optimale.

Commentary

General

3.A.1 Diligence is concerned with the performance of judicial duties in a skillful, careful, attentive and timely way.

3.A.2 Judges should exhibit diligence and competence in the performance of all their judicial duties, including adjudication, case management, pre-trial or settlement conferences and participation in court administration.

3.A.3 Section 55 of the Judges Act[3] provides that: "No judge shall, either directly or indirectly, for himself or herself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties, but every judge shall devote himself or herself exclusively to those judicial duties". Subject to the limitations imposed by the Judges Act and guided by these Ethical Principles, judges may participate in other activities that do not detract from the performance of judicial duties or compromise their independence or impartiality.

3.A.4 Upon appointment, judges should withdraw expeditiously from professional, commercial and business activities.

3.A.5 Generally speaking, a judge is entitled to have 'passive' investments that do not constitute 'carrying on business', provided that little active management is required and there is no interference with the diligent performance of judicial duties. For these reasons, judges should undertake a careful examination of their investments.

3 Judges Act, RSC 1985, c J-1

Commentaires

Général

3.A.1 On entend par diligence le fait d'exercer ses fonctions judiciaires de manière compétente, prudente et attentive, de même qu'avec une célérité raisonnable.

3.A.2 Les juges devraient faire preuve de diligence et de compétence dans l'exercice de toutes leurs fonctions judiciaires, y compris les fonctions décisionnelles, la gestion d'instance, les conférences préparatoires ou de règlement et la participation à l'administration de la justice.

3.A.3 L'article 55 de la Loi sur les juges[3] prévoit que « Les juges se consacrent à leurs fonctions judiciaires à l'exclusion de toute autre activité, qu'elle soit exercée directement ou indirectement, pour leur compte ou celui d'autrui ». Sous réserve des restrictions imposées par la Loi sur les juges et des recommandations formulées dans les Principes de déontologie, les juges peuvent participer à d'autres activités qui ne nuisent pas à l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires ou mettent en péril leur indépendance ou impartialité.

3.A.4 Après leur nomination, les juges devraient se retirer rapidement de leurs activités commerciales et professionnelles, ainsi que de leur intérêts d'affaires.

3.A.5 De manière générale, les juges peuvent avoir des placements « passifs » qui ne constituent pas la « poursuite d'une entreprise », exigent peu de gestion active et ne les empêchent pas d'exercer leurs fonctions judiciaires avec diligence. Pour cette raison, les juges devraient effectuer une analyse serrée de leurs placements.

3.A.6 On occasion, judges are asked by governments to serve on commissions, inquiries or in other public roles. In considering such a request, in addition to the limitations imposed by the Judges Act and the guidance provided by Ethical Principles, judges should consider all implications and discuss the matter with their Chief Justice to ensure that acceptance of an appointment will not unduly interfere with the effective functioning of the court. The terms of reference and other conditions such as time and resources should be examined carefully so as to assess their compatibility with the judicial function.[4]

3.A.7 Judges are uniquely placed to make a variety of contributions to the administration of justice. Subject to the limitations imposed by judicial office, judges are encouraged, for example, to take part in legal education programs for students, lawyers and judges, and in activities to make the law and the legal process more understandable and accessible to the public, such as giving lectures, participating in moot courts or through legal writing.

Timeliness

3.B.1 Judges should perform all assigned judicial duties in a timely manner.

3.A.6 Il arrive que les gouvernements demandent à des juges d'exercer des fonctions publiques, notamment au sein d'une commission ou à l'occasion d'une enquête. Avant de répondre à une telle demande, outre les restrictions imposées par la Loi sur les juges et les recommandations formulées dans les Principes de déontologie, les juges devraient prendre en considération l'ensemble des conséquences et en discuter avec leur juge en chef afin de s'assurer que l'acceptation de la charge proposée ne nuira pas indûment au bon fonctionnement du tribunal. Le mandat et d'autres facteurs tels que la durée et les ressources devraient entrer en ligne de compte lorsqu'il s'agit d'évaluer la compatibilité de la charge proposée avec les fonctions judiciaires.[4]

3.A.7 Les juges sont particulièrement bien placés pour contribuer de diverses manières à l'administration de la justice. Sous réserve des restrictions qui leur sont imposées par leur charge, les juges sont encouragés, par exemple, à prendre part à des programmes de formation juridique à l'intention des étudiants, des avocats et des juges, et à participer à des activités destinées à mieux faire comprendre le droit et la procédure judiciaire au grand public, notamment en donnant des conférences, en participant à un tribunal-école ou en rédigeant des articles ou des livres de droit.

Célérité

3.B.1 Les juges devraient exercer toutes les fonctions judiciaires qui leur sont assignées avec une célérité raisonnable.

4 Canadian Judicial Council Protocol on the Appointment of Judges to Commissions of Inquiry (2010)

4 Conseil canadien de la magistrature, Protocole sur la nomination de juges à des commissions d'enquête (2010)

3.B.2 The preparation of judgments is frequently difficult and time consuming. Judges are expected to produce their decisions and reasons for judgment as soon as reasonably possible, having regard to the urgency of the matter and the length or complexity of the case. In this respect, the CJC has resolved that reserved judgments should be delivered within a maximum of six months after hearings, except in special circumstances.[5] Judges must also comply with legal requirements associated with timeliness of judgments applicable in their jurisdiction.

3.B.3 While judges strive to be diligent in the performance of their judicial duties, their ability to do so may be affected by various factors, including illness, exceptionally heavy burdens of work or the inadequacy of resources supporting their work.

Professional Development[6]

3.C.1 A well-educated and informed judiciary that adheres to high standards of competence is essential to preserving public confidence.

3.C.2 Judges should have and maintain knowledge of the law. Knowledge extends not only to substantive and procedural law but also to an understanding of the impact of the law on those it affects.

3.B.2 L'élaboration d'un jugement est souvent longue et ardue. Les juges sont censés prononcer leurs jugements et les motifs qui les accompagnent dès qu'il est raisonnablement possible de le faire, compte tenu de l'urgence de l'affaire, de sa longueur ou de sa complexité. En cette matière, le Conseil a, par voie de résolution, exprimé l'avis que, sauf s'il existe des circonstances particulières, les juges qui ont mis une affaire en délibéré devraient rendre leur jugement dans les six mois qui suivent l'audience.[5] Les juges doivent aussi respecter les délais imposés par la loi dans leur juridiction, le cas échéant.

3.B.3 Bien que les juges s'efforcent d'agir avec diligence dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires, il peut leur être difficile de le faire en raison de différents facteurs, comme la maladie, une charge de travail exceptionnellement lourde ou l'insuffisance des ressources qui appuient leur travail.

Perfectionnement professionnel[6]

3.C.1 Afin de préserver la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature, il est essentiel que les juges adhèrent à des normes élevées en matière de formation et de compétence.

3.C.2 Les juges devraient connaître le droit et se tenir à jour à cet égard. Cette connaissance s'étend non seulement aux règles de fond et de procédure, mais également à leur compréhension de l'impact qu'elles ont sur les personnes touchées.

3.C.3 Judges are responsible for maintaining and enhancing their knowledge, skills and personal qualities necessary for effective judging. This important element of judicial diligence and competence involves participation in continuing professional development.

3.C.4 Professional development describes formal and informal learning activities that include education, training and private study. It also covers education on social context issues affecting the administration of justice. Social context encompasses knowledge and understanding of the realities of the lives of those who appear in court. This includes the history, heritage and laws related to Indigenous peoples, as well as matters of gender, race, ethnicity, religion, culture, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, differing mental or physical abilities, age and socio-economic background.

3.C.5 Judges should develop and maintain proficiency with technology relevant to the nature and performance of their judicial duties.

3.C.6 As part of a judge's commitment to continuing professional development, judges should engage in self-assessment and self-development, taking responsibility for their standard of knowledge, skill and the development of personal qualities related to judicial duties.

3.C.3 Il incombe aux juges de maintenir et d'accroître les connaissances, les compétences et les qualités personnelles qui leur sont nécessaires pour bien juger. Cet important volet de la diligence et de la compétence des juges implique la participation à des programmes de perfectionnement professionnel continu.

3.C.4 Le perfectionnement professionnel s'entend des activités d'apprentissage, formelles ou informelles, qui visent l'amélioration des connaissances et des compétences et les études personnelles. Il s'étend aussi à la formation touchant le contexte social pertinent à l'administration de la justice, ce qui comprend la connaissance et la compréhension de la réalité vécue par les personnes qui comparaissent devant le tribunal, y compris l'histoire et le patrimoine des peuples autochtones, le droit relatif aux peuples autochtones, ainsi que les questions liées au genre, à la race, à l'origine ethnique, à la religion, à la culture, à l'orientation sexuelle, à l'identité ou à l'expression de genre, aux différences de capacités physiques ou mentales, à l'âge et à l'origine socio-économique.

3.C.5 Les juges devraient développer et maintenir les habiletés technologiques qui ont rapport à la nature et à l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

3.C.6 En lien avec leur engagement envers le perfectionnement professionnel continu, les juges devraient évaluer leur niveau de connaissances et de compétences et les qualités individuelles qui leur permettent de s'acquitter de leurs fonctions judiciaires et s'engager dans un processus continu de perfectionnement professionnel.

3.C.7 To support judges' commitments to their continuing professional development, the CJC and National Judicial Institute, as well as other organizations, have developed relevant, comprehensive, quality educational programs. Judges should participate in these programs in their continuing commitment to acquire, maintain and strengthen their judicial knowledge and skills.

3.C.8 Consistent with their judicial duties, judges are encouraged to take advantage of opportunities to engage with and learn from the wider public, including communities with which the judge has little or no life experience.

Wellness

3.D.1 While judges should exhibit diligence in the performance of their judicial duties, the importance of judges' responsibilities to their families is also recognized.

3.D.2 Judges should set aside sufficient time and make a commitment to the maintenance of physical and mental wellness, and take advantage of judicial assistance programs as appropriate.[7]

3.C.7 Pour soutenir les juges dans cette démarche de perfectionnement professionnel continu, le Conseil et l'Institut national de la magistrature, de même que d'autres organismes, ont élaboré des programmes de formation pertinents, exhaustifs et de qualité. Les juges devraient participer à ces programmes afin de maintenir et d'améliorer leurs connaissances et leurs compétences judiciaires et d'en acquérir de nouvelles.

3.C.8 Lorsque cela est compatible avec leurs fonctions judiciaires, les juges sont encouragés à profiter des occasions de s'intéresser à la collectivité, notamment d'apprendre à mieux connaître les personnes issues de communautés dont l'expérience diffère de la leur.

Bien-être

3.D.1 Bien que les juges soient tenus de faire preuve de diligence dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires, l'on reconnaît par ailleurs l'importance des responsabilités familiales des membres de la magistrature.

3.D.2 Les juges devraient réserver suffisamment de temps au maintien de leur bonne santé physique et mentale et se prévaloir, au besoin, des programmes d'aide qui leur sont offerts.[7]

IV. Equality

Statement

Judges conduct themselves and the proceedings before them to ensure equality according to law.

Principles

A. Judges carry out their duties with respect for all persons, including parties, counsel, witnesses, court personnel and judicial colleagues, without discrimination or prejudice.

B. Judges refrain from discriminatory behaviour. They disassociate themselves from and disapprove of offensive or discriminatory comments or conduct by court staff, counsel or any other person involved in judicial proceedings.

C. Judges are sensitive to and are not influenced by attitudes based on stereotype, myth or prejudice. They make meaningful efforts to recognize and dissociate themselves from such attitudes.

D. Judges do not belong to any organization that engages in or countenances any form of discrimination that contravenes the law.

IV. Égalité

Énoncé

Les juges adoptent une conduite propre à assurer à tous un traitement égal conformément à la loi et ils conduisent les instances dont ils sont saisis dans ce même esprit.

Principes

A. Les juges exercent leurs fonctions en faisant preuve de respect à l'endroit de toutes les personnes, sans discrimination ni préjugés, qu'il s'agisse des parties, des avocats, des témoins, de membres du personnel de la cour ou d'autres juges.

B. Les juges s'abstiennent de comportements discriminatoires. Ils se dissocient de la conduite ou des propos offensants ou discriminatoires que pourraient avoir les membres du personnel de la cour, les avocats ou les autres personnes participant à une instance judiciaire et expriment leur désapprobation à cet égard.

C. Les juges sont sensibles aux attitudes fondées sur des stéréotypes, des mythes ou des préjugés et ne se laissent pas influencer par celles-ci. Les juges font des efforts concrets pour reconnaître ces attitudes et s'en dissocier.

D. Les juges n'adhérent à aucun organisme qui pratique ou approuve une forme quelconque de discrimination prohibée par la loi.

Commentary

General

4.A.1 The Constitution and a variety of statutes guarantee equality before and under the law and equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination. The law's commitment to substantive equality seeks to protect members of the community from both direct discrimination and from the impact of laws and policies that, though neutral on their face, produce adverse effects, or adverse impact, discrimination. This approach to equality seeks to acknowledge the equal worth and dignity of all persons and to ensure that discrimination is prevented and rectified as it affects individuals or groups experiencing disadvantage in our society, often on a systemic or structural basis. The law's strong societal commitment places concern for equality at the core of justice according to law.

4.A.2 Equality, according to law, is fundamental to justice and is strongly linked to judicial impartiality and to public confidence in the administration of justice. Accordingly, judges should ensure that their commitment to equality is unwavering and that their conduct is such that any reasonable and informed member of the public would have confidence in the judge's respect for and commitment to equality.

Commentaires

Général

4.A.1 La Constitution et de nombreuses lois garantissent l'égalité devant la loi et sous le régime de la loi, de même que l'égalité en matière de protection et de bénéfice de la loi, sans discrimination. Cet engagement du législateur envers l'égalité réelle vise à protéger les membres de la collectivité contre la discrimination directe et contre les lois et les politiques qui, en apparence neutres, entraînent de la discrimination par suite d'un effet préjudiciable. Cette approche vise à reconnaître une même valeur à tous les êtres humains et la dignité de toutes les personnes, de manière à prévenir la discrimination, souvent systémique ou structurelle, dont sont victimes les personnes ou les groupes défavorisés de notre société et à y remédier. Cet engagement ferme pris par le législateur au nom de la société place l'égalité au cœur de la justice sous le régime de la loi.

4.A.2 Fondamentale pour la justice, l'égalité sous le régime de la loi est aussi étroitement liée à l'impartialité judiciaire et à la confiance du public dans l'administration de la justice. Par conséquent, les juges devraient être inébranlables dans leur engagement envers l'égalité et s'assurer que leur conduite est telle qu'une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée y verrait la manifestation de leur respect pour le principe d'égalité et leur engagement à l'égard de celui-ci.

Equality in Proceedings

4.B.1 Judges should avoid comments, expressions, gestures or behaviour that may reasonably be interpreted as showing insensitivity to or disrespect for anyone. Examples include inappropriate comments based on stereotypes linked to gender, race, ethnicity, religion, culture, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, differing mental or physical abilities, age and socio-economic background, or other conduct that may create the impression that persons before the court will not be afforded equal consideration and respect. Inappropriate statements by judges, in or out of court, have the potential to call into question their commitment to equality and their ability to be impartial.

4.B.2 Judges should avoid engaging in activities on social media that could reasonably reflect negatively on their commitment to equality.

4.B.3 In proceedings before them, judges should intervene when confronted with discriminatory comments or behaviour. The principle of equality does not, however, require that proper advocacy or admissible testimony be curtailed where, for example, matters of gender, race or other similar factors are properly before the court. The adversarial system gives the parties and their counsel considerable leeway, and the relevance and importance of evidence may be difficult to assess accurately as it is being presented. Judges are expected to listen impartially, but, when necessary, should assert control over the proceeding and act with appropriate firmness to maintain an atmosphere of dignity, equality and order in the courtroom. Judges should be alive to the issues before the court and, where appropriate, seek clarification and provide balanced rulings on the relevance of a given line of questioning.

L'égalité dans le processus judiciaire

4.B.1 Les juges devraient éviter les observations, les expressions, les gestes ou les comportements qui pourraient être raisonnablement interprétés comme un manque de sensibilité ou de respect à l'égard d'une autre personne. En sont des exemples les remarques inappropriées fondées sur des stéréotypes liés au genre, à la race, à l'origine ethnique, à la religion, à la culture, à l'orientation sexuelle, à l'identité ou à l'expression de genre, aux différences de capacités physiques ou mentales, à l'âge, et à l'origine socio-économique, et toute autre conduite qui pourrait laisser entendre que des personnes comparaissant devant le tribunal ne seront pas traitées de façon égale et respectueuse. Les commentaires inappropriés formulés par les juges, en salle d'audience ou ailleurs, peuvent soulever un doute quant à leur engagement envers l'égalité, ou quant à leur impartialité.

4.B.2 Les juges devraient éviter d'avoir, sur les réseaux sociaux, des activités qui sont raisonnablement susceptibles de discréditer leur engagement envers le principe d'égalité.

4.B.3 Dans le cadre des affaires dont ils sont saisis, les juges devraient intervenir lorsqu'ils font face à des propos ou à une conduite discriminatoires. Le principe d'égalité n'implique pas, cependant, que l'on doive interdire la défense légitime d'idées, ou empêcher la présentation de témoignages par ailleurs admissibles, lorsque, par exemple, des questions de genre, de race ou d'autres facteurs semblables sont légitimement soulevés devant la cour. Le système contradictoire donne beaucoup de latitude aux parties et à leurs avocats, et il peut être difficile d'évaluer avec justesse la pertinence et l'importance de la preuve au moment de sa présentation. Les juges sont censés écouter le débat en toute impartialité, mais devraient, si nécessaire, le contrôler fermement et faire preuve de toute la rigueur voulue pour maintenir un climat de dignité, d'égalité et d'ordre dans la salle d'audience. Les juges devraient être sensibles aux questions qui sont devant le tribunal et, lorsque cela est utile, obtenir des précisions sur la pertinence des questions posées par les avocats et rendre des décisions équilibrées sur celles-ci.

4.B.4 Judges should not permit court staff or others subject to their authority or control to engage in conduct that may: show disrespect toward others; constitute discrimination; or reasonably reflect negatively on their commitment to equality.

Avoidance of Stereotypes

4.C.1 Judges do not make assumptions based on general characterizations or attach labels to people that invite stereotypical assumptions about their behaviour or characteristics. Stereotypes are simplistic mental short cuts that generate misleading perceptions and cause mistakes and errors in fact and in law.

4.C.2 Reliance on stereotypes may arise for different reasons, often unintentionally. Judges may not properly appreciate that their reasoning is linked to stereotypical thinking. A judge may be unfamiliar with cultural traditions that would, if known, provide a greater understanding of a party's or a witness's appearance, mannerisms or behaviour.

4.C.3 Judges should educate themselves on the extent to which assumptions rest on stereotypical thinking and should become and remain informed about changing attitudes and values. They should take up opportunities to engage with cultures and communities that are different from their own life experiences to expand their knowledge and understanding. In doing this, judges should take care that these efforts enhance and do not detract from their independence and impartiality. In addition, judges should take advantage of educational opportunities and self-study that will assist them in this regard.

4.B.4 Les juges ne devraient pas laisser le personnel de la cour ou d'autres personnes agissant sous leur autorité ou leur contrôle manquer de respect à autrui, ou adopter des comportements qui peuvent constituer de la discrimination ou qui sont raisonnablement susceptibles de discréditer leur engagement envers le principe d'égalité.

La prévention des stéréotypes

4.C.1 Les juges s'abstiennent de formuler des hypothèses fondées sur des caractérisations générales et d'accoler des étiquettes susceptibles d'encourager la formulation d'hypothèses stéréotypées au sujet du comportement ou des caractéristiques de certaines personnes. Les stéréotypes sont des raccourcis dans le raisonnement qui nourrissent des perceptions trompeuses et conduisent à des erreurs de fait ou de droit.

4.C.2 Le recours aux stéréotypes peut résulter d'un ensemble de causes et n'est souvent pas intentionnel. Il est possible que des juges ne soient pas conscients que leur raisonnement est relié à un stéréotype. Il peut aussi arriver que des juges ne connaissent pas certaines traditions culturelles qui, s'ils les connaissaient, leur permettraient de mieux comprendre la façon de se présenter, d'agir et de se comporter d'une partie ou d'un témoin.

4.C.3 Les juges devraient être sensibilisés au fait que les hypothèses peuvent reposer sur des stéréotypes et prendre les moyens appropriés pour demeurer au fait des changements d'attitudes et de valeurs. Ils devraient s'intéresser aux cultures et aux communautés qui diffèrent de celles qu'ils côtoient de par leur expérience de vie, afin d'élargir leurs connaissances et leur compréhension. Toutefois, les juges devraient s'assurer que les efforts déployés en ce sens renforcent leur indépendance et leur impartialité plutôt que de leur nuire. De plus, les juges devraient profiter des activités de formation et des lectures qui permettent d'en apprendre plus sur ces questions.

Association with Discriminatory Organizations

4.D.1 Judges should conduct their personal lives honourably and in ways that would not reasonably be perceived as an endorsement of any invidious form of discrimination. Judges should avoid associations with organizations that engage in or countenance discrimination contrary to law. A judge's membership in such an organization has the potential to call into question the judge's commitment to equality and may erode public confidence in the judiciary. Judges should also be sensitive to the fact that some organizations' activities, policies and public positions, though not unlawful, may still be offensive to legitimate expectations of equality.

4.D.2 Neither the practice of religion nor membership in a religious organization is inconsistent with Ethical Principles.

Association avec des organismes ayant des pratiques discriminatoires

4.D.1 Les juges devraient se conduire de manière honorable dans leur vie personnelle et faire en sorte que leur comportement ne puisse donner à raisonnablement penser qu'ils appuient une quelconque forme de discrimination préjudiciable. Par conséquent, les juges devraient éviter toute association avec un organisme qui pratique ou approuve une forme de discrimination prohibée par la loi. L'adhésion à un tel organisme est susceptible de remettre en cause l'engagement des juges envers le principe d'égalité et de miner la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature. Les juges devraient aussi être sensibles au fait que l'activité et les politiques de certains organismes ainsi que les opinions qu'ils expriment, quoique licites, peuvent porter atteinte aux attentes légitimes en matière d'égalité.

4.D.2 Ni la pratique d'une religion, ni l'appartenance à un organisme religieux ne sont incompatibles avec les Principes de déontologie.

V. Impartiality

Statement

Judges are impartial and appear to be impartial in the performance of their judicial duties.

Principles

A. Judges ensure that their conduct at all times maintains and enhances confidence in their impartiality and that of the judiciary.

B. Judges avoid conduct which could reasonably cause others to question their impartiality.

C. Judges conduct their affairs so as to avoid real or apparent conflicts of interest between their private interests and their judicial duties.

D. While preserving their impartiality, judges make meaningful efforts to inform and educate the public and the legal profession regarding the law, judicial independence, and the role of judges and the courts in the administration of justice.

E. Judges contemplating retirement and former judges avoid conduct that is likely to bring the judicial office into disrepute or put at risk public expectations of judicial independence, integrity and impartiality.

V. Impartialité

Énoncé

Les juges sont impartiaux et donnent l'apparence d'impartialité dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

Principes

A. Les juges veillent en toutes circonstances à ce que leur conduite entretienne et accroisse la confiance dans leur impartialité et celle de la magistrature en général.

B. Les juges évitent les comportements pouvant raisonnablement amener autrui à mettre en doute leur impartialité.

C. Les juges mènent leurs affaires de manière à éviter tout conflit réel ou apparent entre leurs intérêts personnels et leurs fonctions judiciaires.

D. Tout en veillant à préserver leur impartialité, les juges s'efforcent d'éduquer le public et la profession juridique et de les informer sur le droit, l'indépendance judiciaire et le rôle des juges et des tribunaux dans l'administration de la justice.

E. Les juges qui songent à quitter ou qui ont quitté la magistrature évitent toute conduite susceptible de jeter le discrédit sur la fonction judiciaire ou de miner les attentes du public quant à l'indépendance, à l'intégrité et à l'impartialité de la magistrature.

Commentary

General

5.A.1 For centuries, adjudication by impartial and independent judges has been recognized as fundamental to the rule of law. Impartiality is a fundamental qualification of a judge and a core attribute of the judiciary.

5.A.2 Impartiality requires not only the absence of bias and prejudgment, but also the absence of any appearance of partiality. This dual aspect of impartiality is captured in the oft-repeated words that justice must not only be done, but manifestly be seen to be done. The test is whether a reasonable and informed person with knowledge of all relevant circumstances, viewing the matter realistically and practically, would apprehend a lack of impartiality in the judge.

5.A.3 While there is a close association between the judge's ethical and legal duties of impartiality, Ethical Principles is not intended to deal with the law relating to judicial disqualification or recusal.

Judicial Duties

5.A.4 Judges have a fundamental obligation to be and to appear to be impartial. This obligation of impartiality does not presuppose that judges are free of life experiences, sympathies or opinions. Rather, it requires judges to be sensitive to their own biases and to consider different points of view with an open mind. Judges should interact with all parties fairly and even-handedly.

Commentaires

Général

5.A.1 Depuis des siècles, on reconnaît que la décision des litiges par des juges impartiaux et indépendants est essentielle à la primauté du droit. L'impartialité est l'une des qualités fondamentales des juges et un attribut central de la fonction judiciaire.

5.A.2 L'impartialité requiert non seulement l'absence de préjugés et de partis pris, mais également l'absence d'apparence de partialité. Ces deux volets de l'impartialité sont bien résumés dans la maxime selon laquelle non seulement justice doit être rendue, mais encore elle doit paraître avoir été rendue. Le critère applicable consiste à se demander si une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée, qui serait au courant de toutes les circonstances pertinentes et étudierait la question de façon réaliste et pratique, craindrait que le juge ne soit pas impartial.

5.A.3 Bien qu'il existe des liens étroits entre les devoirs éthiques et juridiques des juges en matière d'impartialité, les Principes de déontologie ne sont pas destinés à traiter du droit relatif à la récusation des juges.

Fonctions judiciaires

5.A.4 Les juges ont l'obligation fondamentale d'être et de paraître impartiaux. L'obligation d'impartialité ne présuppose pas que les juges n'ont aucune expérience personnelle, sympathie ou opinion. Elle exige plutôt que les juges soient conscients de leurs propres préjugés et accueillent différents points de vue en gardant un esprit ouvert. Les juges devraient traiter toutes les parties avec équité et sur un pied d'égalité.

5.A.5 Judges should avoid using words or conduct, in and out of court, that might give rise to a reasonable perception of bias. The expectations of litigants are high. Disappointed litigants will sometimes perceive bias when neither actual bias nor a reasonable apprehension of bias exists. A judge's remarks or tone may diminish the judge's perceived impartiality. An unjustified reprimand of counsel, an improper remark about a litigant or a witness or a statement evidencing prejudgment or intemperate and impatient behaviour may undermine the appearance of impartiality. Casual conversations or familiarity with counsel or participants in the proceedings may be perceived by others as a form of exclusion. Therefore, judges should ensure that their comments or conduct do not provide reasonable grounds for a perception of bias.

5.A.6 While judges may wish to signal support for causes or viewpoints through words or in the wearing or display of symbols of support, even if they seem innocuous, such communications may be interpreted as reflecting a lack of impartiality or the use of the position of the judge to make a political or other statement. For these reasons, judges should avoid statements or visible symbols of support, particularly in the context of court proceedings.

5.A.7 Judges should ensure that proceedings are conducted in an orderly and efficient manner and that the court process is not abused. An appropriate measure of firmness may be necessary to achieve this end. In the presence of challenging or vexatious litigants, judges should be firm, decisive and at the same time respectful to ensure that litigants' rights are protected.

5.A.5 Les juges devraient éviter de s'exprimer ou de se comporter, en salle d'audience ou ailleurs, de manière à susciter une perception raisonnable de partialité. Les attentes des parties sont élevées. Il peut arriver qu'une partie déçue perçoive l'existence d'un préjugé malgré l'absence de partialité réelle ou de crainte raisonnable de partialité. Des remarques formulées par les juges ou le ton employé pour exprimer celles-ci peuvent miner la perception d'impartialité des juges. Les remontrances injustifiées faites aux avocats, les remarques déplacées au sujet des parties ou des témoins, les déclarations manifestant un parti pris et les comportements immodérés et impatients peuvent saper l'apparence d'impartialité. Les conversations ou comportements empreints de familiarité avec les avocats ou les participants à l'instance peuvent être perçus par d'autres comme une forme d'exclusion. Par conséquent, les juges devraient s'assurer que leurs commentaires ou leur conduite ne donnent pas prise à une perception raisonnable de partialité.

5.A.6 Bien que des juges puissent vouloir exprimer leur appui pour certaines causes ou points de vue, les paroles ou le port d'insignes marquant cet appui, même lorsqu'ils semblent inoffensifs, peuvent être interprétés comme un manque d'impartialité ou être vus comme un moyen d'utiliser la fonction judiciaire pour faire une déclaration politique ou autre. Pour cette raison, les juges devraient éviter de tenir des propos ou de porter des insignes visibles marquant leur appui, en particulier dans le cadre du processus judiciaire.

5.A.7 Les juges devraient veiller à ce que l'instance se déroule de manière ordonnée et efficace, tout en prévenant les abus de procédure. Une certaine fermeté peut s'imposer selon les circonstances. En présence d'une partie difficile ou quérulente, les juges devraient se comporter de manière ferme et décisive, sans renoncer au respect requis pour assurer la protection des droits des parties.

5.A.8 Judges have a responsibility to promote opportunities for all persons to understand the judicial process and to meaningfully present their case, whether or not they have legal representation. Self-represented persons may sometime be uninformed about their rights and about the consequences of the options they choose. Judges should take appropriate and reasonable measures to provide a fair and impartial process and prevent an unfair disadvantage to self-represented persons.[8] Such measures are consistent with impartiality provided that they are fair to other parties.

5.A.9 Judges should be particularly attuned to the perception of bias that might arise in circumstances where one or more parties are self-represented. Appropriate assistance to a self-represented litigant may be perceived by the opposing, represented party as manifesting bias. Accommodations extended to self-represented litigants should not extend to the point where they become unfair to the other party. Clear and transparent communication with all parties is necessary to avoid unwarranted apprehension of bias.

5.A.8 Les juges ont la responsabilité de s'assurer que toute personne, qu'elle soit représentée ou non représentée, ait la possibilité de comprendre le processus judiciaire et de faire valoir sa position. Les personnes non représentées peuvent parfois être mal informées de leurs droits et des conséquences de leurs choix. Les juges devraient prendre des moyens appropriés et raisonnables afin d'établir un processus équitable et impartial et d'empêcher que les personnes non représentées ne soient pas injustement désavantagées.[8] De tels moyens se concilient avec l'impartialité pour autant qu'ils soient équitables envers toutes les parties.

5.A.9 Les juges devraient être particulièrement sensibles à la possibilité d'une perception de partialité dans les situations où l'une des parties ou plusieurs d'entre elles ne sont pas représentées. L'assistance congruente que les juges apportent à une partie non représentée peut être perçue par la partie adverse représentée par avocat comme la manifestation d'un parti pris. Les accommodements accordés aux parties non représentées ne devraient pas rendre le processus injuste pour les parties représentées. Il est nécessaire de communiquer de façon claire et transparente avec toutes les parties afin de dissiper les craintes injustifiées de partialité.

8 Canadian Judicial Council Statement of Principles on Self-represented Litigants and Accused Persons (2006)

8 Conseil canadien de la magistrature, Énoncé de principes concernant les plaideurs et les accusés non représentés par un avocat (2006)

5.A.10 An expanding aspect of judicial responsibility for judges is their work in settlement conferences and the judicial mediation of disputes. Direct engagement with litigants and counsel in these non-adjudicative settings often takes judges outside the confines of their traditional roles and presents additional challenges in relation to impartiality. Given the variety of settings in which this work takes place, it is not possible to articulate bright line rules to provide guidance in every situation. However, there are values and boundaries which judges should respect in these settings. When engaging in non-adjudicative dispute resolution, judges should ensure that: (i) the process and outcomes are acceptable to the parties themselves; (ii) the outcomes are the subject of informed decision-making by the parties; (iii) the process is transparent to the parties; (iv) the outcomes are not coercive, unconscionable, or illegal; and (v) the legitimate interests of known non-involved third parties are considered. Transparency in this context means openness in the broadest sense and is not intended to discourage caucusing in appropriate circumstances.

Restraints

5.B.1 On appointment, judges do not surrender all of the rights and freedoms enjoyed by everyone else in Canada. Nevertheless, the office of the judge imposes restraints that are necessary to maintain public confidence in the impartiality and independence of the judiciary. In defining the appropriate degree of public involvement by a judge there are two fundamental considerations. The first is whether the involvement could reasonably undermine confidence in the judge's impartiality. The second is whether such involvement may expose the judge to criticism or be inconsistent with the dignity and integrity of judicial office.

5.A.10 Les responsabilités des juges s'étendent de plus en plus aux modes alternatifs de règlement des litiges et à la médiation judiciaire. Les interactions directes entre juges, parties et avocats inhérentes à ces processus non juridictionnels s'inscrivent souvent en dehors des cadres traditionnels de l'activité judiciaire et soulèvent des enjeux additionnels en matière d'impartialité. Comme ces cadres de travail varient grandement, il n'est pas possible d'établir des règles claires et précises susceptibles d'apporter des solutions à toutes les éventualités. Néanmoins, les juges devraient respecter certaines valeurs et limites dans ces situations et notamment s'assurer de ce qui suit : (i) le processus et les résultats qui en découleront sont acceptables pour les parties elles-mêmes; (ii) les parties ont consenti en toute connaissance de cause aux résultats; (iii) le processus est transparent pour les parties; (iv) les résultats ne sont pas coercitifs, iniques ou contraires à la loi; et (v) les intérêts légitimes des tiers connus qui ne sont pas parties au litige sont pris en compte. Dans ce contexte, la transparence s'entend d'une ouverture, au sens large, et n'est pas incompatible avec la possibilité de rencontres individuelles, le cas échéant.

Restrictions

5.B.1 Les juges ne renoncent pas, du fait de leur nomination, à l'ensemble des droits et libertés dont jouit chaque personne au Canada. Cependant, la charge de juge impose des contraintes qui sont nécessaires au maintien de la confiance du public dans l'impartialité et l'indépendance de la magistrature. Deux questions fondamentales entrent en ligne de compte lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer le niveau d'intervention publique qui convient à un membre de la magistrature. La première consiste à savoir si l'intervention pourrait raisonnablement saper la confiance dans l'impartialité du juge et la deuxième, si cette intervention est susceptible d'exposer le juge aux critiques ou est par ailleurs incompatible avec la dignité et l'intégrité de la fonction judiciaire.

Political Activity

5.B.2 Judges must cease all partisan political activity upon the assumption of judicial office. Moreover, judges refrain from conduct that, in the mind of a reasonable and informed person, could give rise to the appearance that the judge is engaged in political activity. For this reason, judges must refrain from: (i) membership in political parties and political fundraising; (ii) attendance at political gatherings and political fundraising events; (iii) contributing financially or otherwise to political parties or campaigns; (iv) signing petitions to influence a political decision; and (v) taking part publicly in controversial political discussions, except in respect of matters directly affecting the operation of the courts, the independence of the judiciary or fundamental aspects of the administration of justice.

5.B.3 Like partisan political activity, out of court statements by a judge concerning issues of public controversy may undermine impartiality. They are also likely to lead to public confusion about the nature of the relationship between the judiciary on the one hand and the executive and legislative branches of government on the other. Partisan actions and political statements by definition involve publicly choosing one side of a debate over another. In order to preserve their impartiality, judges should refrain from any political action or involvement. The perception of partiality will be reinforced if the judge's activities attract criticism and/or rebuttal. This in turn tends to undermine public confidence in the judiciary. Judges should not use the privileged platform of judicial office to enter the public arena because it puts at risk public confidence in the impartiality and the independence of the judiciary.

Activités politiques

5.B.2 Les juges doivent se retirer de toute activité politique de nature partisane dès leur entrée en fonction. De plus, les juges évitent toute conduite susceptible de donner à une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée l'impression qu'ils s'adonnent à une activité politique. Pour cette raison, les juges doivent éviter de faire ce qui suit : (i) adhérer à des partis politiques et à des campagnes de financement politique; (ii) participer à des rassemblements politiques ou à des activités de financement politique; (iii) verser des contributions financières à des partis ou à des campagnes politiques ou y contribuer d'autres manières; (iv) signer des pétitions visant à influencer une décision politique; et (v) intervenir publiquement dans des débats politiques, sauf sur des questions concernant directement le fonctionnement des tribunaux, l'indépendance de la magistrature ou des éléments fondamentaux de l'administration de la justice.

5.B.3 Tout comme les activités politiques de nature partisane, les propos hors du cadre judiciaire sur des questions soulevant une controverse publique peuvent miner l'image d'impartialité du juge. En outre, ils risquent de créer de la confusion auprès du public en ce qui concerne les rapports entre le pouvoir judiciaire, d'une part, et les pouvoirs exécutif et législatif, d'autre part. Par définition, les activités partisanes et les déclarations politiques impliquent une prise de position publique à l'égard d'une question particulière. Afin de préserver leur impartialité, les juges devraient éviter toute activité ou participation politique. La perception de partialité sera plus aiguë si les activités auxquelles s'adonnent les juges font l'objet de critiques ou de contestations. Ces réactions, à leur tour, tendront à miner la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature. Les juges ne devraient pas utiliser le prestige associé à la fonction judiciaire comme levier dans l'arène publique, car, ce faisant, ils mettent en péril la confiance du public dans l'impartialité et l'indépendance de la magistrature.

5.B.4 Chief Justices and other judges with administrative responsibilities will necessarily have contact and interaction with the executive branch of government, including attorneys general, deputy attorneys general and court services officials. These engagements are appropriate provided that the interactions are not partisan in nature.

5.B.5 If a member of a judge's family is politically active, the judge should recognize that such activities of close family members may adversely affect the public perception of the judge's impartiality. In cases where such public perceptions may arise, a judge should consider whether recusal is the appropriate remedy in a given case.

Public Statements

5.B.6 There are limited circumstances in which judges may properly speak out, though with restraint, about a matter that is publicly controversial, namely, when the matter directly affects the operation of the courts, the independence of the judiciary or fundamental aspects of the administration of justice. Chief Justices have particular responsibilities in this regard. Judges should follow any protocol established by their Court on these matters.

5.B.7 If their personal integrity has been called into question in a public context, judges should seek guidance from their Chief Justice and, if appropriate, other trusted advisors.

5.B.4 Les juges en chef et les autres juges qui exercent des responsabilités administratives sont appelés à communiquer et à interagir avec des membres du pouvoir exécutif, dont les procureurs généraux, les sous-ministres ou sous-procureurs généraux et les administrateurs des tribunaux. Ces interactions sont appropriées, en autant qu'elles n'ont pas de dimension partisane.

5.B.5 Les juges devraient être conscients que les activités politiques d'un membre de leur famille immédiate peuvent compromettre leur image d'impartialité auprès du public. Dans les cas où la perception du public pourrait être compromise dans une affaire particulière dont ils sont saisis, les juges devraient considérer s'il y a lieu de se récuser.

Déclarations publiques

5.B.6 Il existe des circonstances où les juges, quoique avec retenue, peuvent exprimer publiquement leur avis sur un sujet controversé, notamment lorsque ce dernier concerne directement le fonctionnement des tribunaux, l'indépendance de la magistrature ou des aspects fondamentaux de l'administration de la justice. Les juges en chef ont une responsabilité particulière à cet égard. Les juges devraient se conformer aux protocoles établis par leur propre cour, le cas échéant.

5.B.7 Dans le cas où leur intégrité personnelle serait publiquement mise en doute, les juges devraient obtenir l'avis de leur juge en chef et, au besoin, d'autres conseillers dignes de confiance.

Judicial Promotion and Opportunities

5.B.8 Leadership positions in courts, opportunities for elevation to a higher court and other opportunities for judges arise from time to time. These decisions are ultimately made by the executive branch of government. Judges are entitled to seek these positions and advance their qualifications, but should exercise reserve in their communication of interest, or the communication of interest by others on their behalf, so as to avoid any conduct that would compromise their impartiality or undermine the integrity of the appointment process.

Public Engagement, Civic and Charitable Activity

5.B.9 Many judges wish to become or continue to be active in various forms of public service to their communities. This involvement benefits the community and judges but also carries risks.

5.B.10 On one hand, there are likely to be beneficial aspects of the judge being active in appropriate forms of public service. Judges administer the law on behalf of the community and are appointed to serve the public. Therefore, unnecessary isolation from the community does not promote wise or just judgments. In order to undertake their work with competence and diligence, and in ways that are consistent with judicial duties, judges are encouraged to take up opportunities to engage with and learn from the wider public, including communities with which they have little or no life experience.

Promotion et autres opportunités pour les juges

5.B.8 Il arrive que des juges soient pressentis pour des fonctions de leadership au sein d'une cour ou en vue de leur accession à une cour de juridiction supérieure, ou que d'autres occasions se présentent à eux. Les décisions finales en cette matière relèvent du pouvoir exécutif. Les juges sont en droit de soumettre leur candidature à ces postes et de faire valoir leurs compétences, mais devraient faire preuve de réserve lorsqu'il s'agit d'exprimer leur intérêt soit directement, soit par l'entremise d'une autre personne, afin d'éviter toute conduite qui mettrait en péril leur impartialité ou minerait l'intégrité du processus de nomination.

Participation à la vie publique et activités sociales ou communautaires

5.B.9 Nombre de juges souhaitent s'impliquer dans des activités sociales ou communautaires ou maintenir leur engagement à cet égard. Cet engagement est bénéfique tant pour la société que pour les juges, mais comporte également des risques.

5.B.10 D'une part, la participation des juges à diverses activités sociales ou communautaires appropriées est sans doute avantageuse. Les juges appliquent la loi au nom de la société et sont nommés pour servir la population. Par conséquent, leur isolement excessif du reste de la collectivité est peu propice à des décisions justes et judicieuses. Afin qu'ils exercent leurs fonctions avec compétence et diligence, dans le respect des devoirs de leur charge, les juges sont encouragés à saisir les occasions qui leur permettent d'interagir avec le public et de mieux comprendre leur société, y compris les groupes qu'ils connaissent peu ou pas de par leur expérience personnelle.

5.B.11 On the other hand, the judge's civic involvement may, in some cases, jeopardize the perception of impartiality. Judges should exercise caution when considering their involvement in community activities and be attentive to the limits that judicial appointment places upon their freedom to undertake these activities. Community involvement on the part of the judge should be assessed in light of the form of public service under consideration, the activities and goals of the organization, the role to be played by the judge within it, the risk that the organization may become engaged in litigation and any other relevant factor.

5.B.12 Generally speaking, judges should refrain from membership in or association with groups or organizations or participation in public discussion which, in the mind of a reasonable and informed person, would undermine confidence in a judge's impartiality with respect to issues that could come before the courts. In service to their communities, judges must not give legal or investment advice, and should avoid involvement in causes or organizations that are likely to be engaged in litigation. Judges should use even greater caution in considering whether to become officers or directors of community organizations.

5.B.13 While, in the past, Canadian judges have served in leadership positions with organizations such as universities and religious bodies, this service is potentially problematic. The risk that such organizations will become involved in litigation or be the subject of public controversy creates the possibility that the judge will be placed in an awkward position, both in relation to public confidence in the judge's impartiality and in the judiciary as a whole. While judges may consider accepting such positions, they should reflect on issues of perceived or actual conflict before doing so, all with a view to determining whether the role can be structured in such a way so as to avoid conflicts and appearances of conflict.

5.B.11 D'autre part, l'engagement social et communautaire des juges peut parfois compromettre leur image d'impartialité. Les juges devraient faire preuve de prudence lorsqu'ils envisagent de participer à des activités sociales ou communautaires et être sensibles au fait que l'accession à la magistrature leur impose des limites à cet égard. L'opportunité d'une participation devrait être appréciée en fonction du type de service public envisagé, des activités et objectifs de l'organisme, du rôle que le juge serait appelé à y jouer, du risque que l'organisme soit partie à un litige et de tout autre facteur pertinent.

5.B.12 En général, les juges devraient s'abstenir d'adhérer ou de s'associer à un groupement ou à un organisme, ou de participer à un débat public, lorsque, du point de vue d'une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée, cette adhésion ou cette participation serait susceptible de miner la confiance dans l'impartialité des juges relativement à des questions susceptibles d'être soumises aux tribunaux. Dans le cadre de leurs activités sociales ou communautaires, les juges doivent s'abstenir de donner des conseils juridiques ou des conseils en matière de placements et devraient éviter de participer à des causes ou à des organisations susceptibles d'être impliquées dans un litige. Les juges ne devraient envisager d'occuper des postes de dirigeant ou d'administrateur d'un organisme social ou communautaire qu'avec la plus grande prudence.

5.B.13 Bien que certains juges du Canada aient dans le passé occupé des fonctions de leadership au sein d'entités telles que des universités ou des organisations religieuses, l'exercice de telles fonctions peut soulever des difficultés. Il existe un risque que ces entités soient parties à un litige, ou qu'elles fassent l'objet d'une controverse publique, ce qui pourrait placer le juge dans une situation délicate du point de vue de la confiance du public, tant à l'égard de son impartialité qu'à l'endroit de la magistrature dans son ensemble. Avant d'accepter de telles fonctions, les juges devraient considérer les risques de conflit réel ou perçu et s'il est possible d'établir une structure permettant d'éviter les conflits et les apparences de conflit.

5.B.14 Involvement with a community organization that at one time was appropriate may become inappropriate. Judges should re-evaluate these associations in light of changing circumstances.

Social Media

5.B.15 Social media activities are subject to the overarching principles that guide judicial behaviour. Judges should be aware of how their activities on social media may reflect on themselves and upon the judiciary and should be attentive to the potential implications for their ability to perform their judicial role. Judges should also be attentive to and may wish to inform family members of the ways in which their social media activities could reflect adversely on the judge.

5.B.16 Communication by social media is more public and more permanent than many other forms of communication. It enables messages to be re-transmitted beyond the originators' control and without their consent. Comments or images intended for a limited audience can be shared, almost instantaneously, with a vast audience and may create an adverse reaction far beyond what one may have considered possible. Social media can also create greater opportunities for inappropriate communications to judges from others.

5.B.14 La participation à un organisme social ou communautaire qui est jugée appropriée à un moment donné peut cesser de l'être par la suite. Les juges devraient réévaluer leurs associations en fonction des changements de circonstances.

Médias sociaux

5.B.15 Les communications dans les médias sociaux sont assujetties aux principes fondamentaux qui guident la conduite des juges. Les juges devraient être conscients du fait que ces communications peuvent ternir leur réputation et celle de la magistrature et se répercuter sur leur capacité d'exercer leurs fonctions judiciaires. Par ailleurs, les juges devraient être conscients que les communications des membres de leur famille pourraient également se répercuter défavorablement sur eux; il pourrait y avoir lieu de les en informer.

5.B.16 Les communications affichées dans les médias sociaux peuvent rarement être effacées et n'ont pas vraiment de caractère privé. Elles peuvent facilement être disséminées sans le consentement de leur auteur et échapper à son contrôle. Les commentaires et les images destinés à être partagés dans un cercle fermé peuvent être rediffusés, parfois instantanément, à un vaste auditoire et provoquer une réaction défavorable qui dépasse largement ce qu'on aurait imaginé. Les médias sociaux ouvrent aussi des avenues additionnelles permettant à un membre du public de transmettre des communications inappropriées à un membre de la magistrature.

5.B.17 Judges' communications and associations with others are commonly used as a basis for claims of lack of impartiality. Judges should be vigilant in minimizing reasonable apprehensions of bias arising from these communications and associations. This is all the more important, and difficult, in the age of social media. Judges who choose to use social media should exercise great caution in their communications and associations within these networks, including expressions of support or disapproval. This includes judges informing themselves about the functioning, and the application, of security and privacy settings appropriate to their use of social media.

5.B.18 In a digital world, out-of-court information is much more accessible and the acquisition of such information by a judge is more readily discoverable. Accordingly, judges should be vigilant to avoid inappropriately acquiring or receiving out-of-court information related to the parties, witnesses or issues under consideration in matters before them. Fairness issues may need to be considered by the judge should this happen.

Gifts and Remuneration

5.B.19 Judges must not accept gifts from litigants, lawyers, law firms or any other person in contexts that give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias. This does not prevent judges from accepting gifts of nominal value in appreciation for having spoken at or contributed to events or conferences, or have their reasonable expenses reimbursed. Such gifts are acceptable, provided that they do not represent remuneration and their acceptance would not create, in the mind of a reasonable and informed person, a perception of partiality.

5.B.17 Les allégations touchant le manque d'impartialité sont souvent fondées sur des propos des juges ou sur le fait qu'ils entretiennent des rapports avec certaines personnes. Les juges devraient éviter que de telles communications ou de tels rapports donnent prise à une crainte raisonnable quant à leur impartialité. Les médias sociaux compliquent les choses à cet égard. Les juges qui choisissent d'y être présents devraient faire preuve d'une grande prudence dans leurs communications, y compris en ce qui concerne l'usage de symboles d'approbation ou de désaccord. Ils devraient également se renseigner sur le fonctionnement et l'application des paramètres de sécurité et de protection de la vie privée convenant à leur utilisation des médias sociaux.

5.B.18 À l'ère numérique, il est beaucoup plus facile d'accéder à des renseignements extrajudiciaires et de laisser des traces en le faisant. Par conséquent, les juges devraient veiller à éviter d'obtenir ou de recevoir de façon inappropriée des renseignements extrajudiciaires relatifs aux parties, aux témoins ou aux questions dont ils sont saisis. Une telle situation, si elle survenait, pourrait soulever des questions d'équité que le juge pourrait devoir prendre en considération.

Cadeaux et rémunération

5.B.19 Les juges ne doivent pas accepter de cadeaux de la part des parties à un litige, d'avocats ou de leur cabinet ou de toute autre personne lorsque cela est susceptible de susciter une crainte raisonnable de partialité. Cela ne signifie pas qu'il est interdit aux juges d'accepter des cadeaux de valeur symbolique pour leur contribution à la tenue d'événements ou de conférences ou d'obtenir le remboursement de frais raisonnables. De tels cadeaux sont acceptables, en autant qu'ils ne constituent pas une rémunération et que le fait de les accepter ne susciterait pas chez une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée une perception de partialité.

Speeches and Conferences

5.B.20 It is common for judges to be asked to speak in public. Judges' public engagement aimed at educating others is a benefit to the judiciary and the public they serve. Judges are encouraged to attend events as speakers, both to contribute their knowledge and to undertake their own professional development. However, speaking in public carries risks to the public perception of the judge's impartiality and must be approached with care. Judges should give careful consideration to a range of factors when deciding whether to accept a speaking invitation and, if so, what the judge may properly address in a speech. These include: (i) the organization inviting the judge to speak; (ii) the anticipated audience; (iii) the topic or general theme to be addressed in the speech; (iv) the degree to which the topic relates to matters concerning the judiciary or the courts; (v) whether the topic or the judge's remarks relates to a matter of public policy or public controversy; vi) the likelihood that the speech will be reported on, recorded or made available to a broader public; and (vii) the value of the judge's remarks in informing or educating the intended audience. If judges have any doubts regarding the appropriateness of accepting a speaking engagement they should seek the advice of their Chief Justice.

Attendance at Events

5.B.21 Judges may attend social or public events, or conferences provided that such attendance does not compromise their impartiality and the nature of the event, or host, does not raise other concerns related to Ethical Principles.

Discours et participation à des conférences

5.B.20 Il est fréquent que des juges soient invités à prendre la parole en public. La participation des juges à des programmes éducatifs est bénéfique, tant pour la magistrature que pour le public qu'elle sert. Il est souhaitable que les juges donnent des conférences et contribuent par ce moyen à l'avancement des connaissances et à leur propre perfectionnement professionnel. Cependant, la prise de parole en public peut nuire à la perception d'impartialité des juges et devrait être abordée prudemment. Avant d'accepter une invitation à prononcer une conférence, et d'en déterminer le contenu, les juges devraient analyser avec soin un certain nombre d'éléments, dont les suivants : (i) la provenance de l'invitation, (ii) l'auditoire envisagé, (iii) le sujet ou le thème à aborder, (iv) le rapport plus ou moins étroit entre le sujet à aborder et les questions qui touchent la magistrature ou les tribunaux, (v) le rapport entre le sujet à aborder ou l'allocution du juge et des questions de politique publique ou des enjeux controversés, (vi) la probabilité que le discours soit cité dans les médias, enregistré ou autrement mis à la disposition du public et (vii) l'intérêt des propos du juge du point de vue de l'information ou de l'éducation du public. En cas de doute quant à l'opportunité d'accepter une invitation, les juges devraient consulter leur juge en chef.

Présence à des événements

5.B.21 Les juges peuvent participer à des événements sociaux ou publics ou à des congrès ou colloques, pourvu que leur présence ne mette pas en péril leur impartialité, ou que la nature de l'événement ou l'identité de l'hôte ne soulève pas de crainte au regard des Principes de déontologie.

5.B.22 Judges may participate in social programs at conferences provided that they are generally available to attendees or speakers and the sponsorship, nature and extent of social programs would not create, in the view of a reasonable and informed person, a perception of lack of impartiality.

5.B.23 Attendance by a judge at conferences and social events sponsored by businesses or organizations is potentially problematic. Where invited, the judge should consider the organization hosting the event, whether the invitation has also been extended to community leaders, the purpose for which the judge was invited and the potential for adverse public perception as a result of the attendance.

5.B.24 When judges are invited to attend social events associated with the law or the legal profession, or hosted by law firms, they should consider the nature of the social event, its sponsorship, the other invitees and attendees at the event, the purpose for which the judge has been invited, the existence of a previous personal relationship with the host and attendees, as well as the benefit to the judge, the judiciary and the legal profession as a result of the judge's attendance. Judges should avoid attendance at such events if a purpose of the event is to advance a commercial interest, to showcase the host's relationship with the judge, or if clients are in attendance.

5.B.22 Les juges peuvent participer au volet social de congrès ou de colloques, en autant que ces activités soient normalement accessibles aux participants ou aux conférenciers et que le commanditaire, la nature et l'étendue de ces activités sociales soient tels qu'ils ne puissent susciter chez une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée la perception d'un manque d'impartialité.

5.B.23 La participation des juges à des congrès ou colloques ou à des activités sociales qui sont commandités par des entreprises ou des organismes peut soulever des difficultés. Lorsqu'ils sont invités, les juges devraient prendre en compte la nature de l'organisme hôte, le fait que d'autres personnes en vue au sein de la collectivité ont aussi été invitées, l'intention derrière l'invitation faite aux juges et la possibilité que le public perçoive défavorablement la présence de juges à un tel événement.

5.B.24 La participation des juges à des activités sociales liées au droit ou à la profession juridique ou organisées par un cabinet d'avocats devrait aussi être évaluée en fonction de la nature de l'événement, de l'identité des commanditaires, de l'identité des autres participants ou invités, de l'intention derrière l'invitation faite aux juges, de l'existence de liens personnels antérieurs entre le juge et les hôtes ou autres invités, et du bénéfice qui résulterait de la présence du juge d'un point de vue personnel, du point de vue de la magistrature ou de celui de la profession juridique. Les juges devraient s'abstenir de participer à de telles activités si leur objet est lié à des fins commerciales, si l'événement vise à souligner l'existence d'une relation entre le juge et l'hôte ou si des clients de l'hôte sont présents.

Conflicts of Interest

5.C.1 The discussion of conflicts of interest in Ethical Principles is not intended to state the law relating to judicial disqualification or recusal. It is intended to provide guidance to judges as they identify and assess the circumstances in which their personal interests may be reasonably viewed by others as conflicting with their judicial duties. In assessing their ethical duties in this context, judges should remain conscious of the demands of the sound administration of justice and their duty to hear the cases assigned to them.

5.C.2 The potential for a conflict of interest arises when the personal interest of the judge (or of those close to the judge) conflicts with the judge's duty to adjudicate impartially. Judicial impartiality is concerned with impartiality in fact and in the perception of a reasonable and informed person. As a result, judges should be attentive to both actual conflicts between their self-interest and their duty of impartial adjudication, and to circumstances in which a reasonable and informed person would reasonably apprehend a conflict.

5.C.3 Conflicts of interest may arise from: a pecuniary or non-pecuniary interest in the outcome; a close family, personal or professional relationship with a litigant, counsel or witness; or the judge having expressed views evidencing bias regarding a litigant or an issue that is before the court.

Conflits d'intérêts

5.C.1 Les Principes de déontologie n'ont pas pour objet de traiter du droit relatif à la récusation des juges. Dans le présent document, la discussion des conflits d'intérêts vise à offrir aux juges des pistes de réflexion qui leur permettent d'identifier et d'évaluer les circonstances où leurs intérêts personnels pourraient raisonnablement être vus par d'autres comme entrant en conflit avec leurs fonctions judiciaires. Lorsqu'ils évaluent leurs obligations déontologiques dans ce cadre, les juges devraient garder à l'esprit les exigences d'une saine administration de la justice et leur devoir d'entendre les affaires qui leur sont confiées.

5.C.2 Il y a risque de conflit d'intérêts lorsque l'intérêt personnel du juge (ou de ses proches) s'oppose à son devoir de rendre la justice avec impartialité. L'impartialité judiciaire s'entend à la fois de l'impartialité réelle et de l'impartialité apparente, selon la perception d'une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée. Par conséquent, les juges doivent être sensibles non seulement aux conflits réels entre leur intérêt personnel et leur devoir de rendre la justice de manière impartiale, mais également aux situations dans lesquelles une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée éprouverait une crainte raisonnable de conflit d'intérêts.

5.C.3 Un conflit d'intérêts peut survenir lorsque les juges ont un intérêt patrimonial ou extrapatrimonial dans l'issue d'un procès; une relation de parenté, une amitié proche ou une relation professionnelle avec une partie, un avocat ou un témoin; ou lorsque les juges expriment des opinions manifestant de la partialité à l'égard d'une partie ou d'un enjeu débattu devant le tribunal.

5.C.4 Upon appointment, judges must immediately cease practicing law, and should divest themselves and remain divested of their interests in commercial and business activities. Severance of all association with the judge's legal practice should be done as quickly as possible, ideally in an immediate and final way.

5.C.5 Generally speaking, judges are entitled to manage 'passive' investments that do not constitute 'carrying on business', provided that the investment is truly passive with little active management required. Nevertheless, judges should not participate in a case in which they have a financial, property or other interest that could be affected by its outcome or in which their interest would give rise to a potential apprehension of lack of impartiality by a reasonable and informed person. This is true whether the interest is itself the subject matter of the controversy or where the outcome of the case could materially affect the value of any interest or property owned by the judge, the judge's family or close associates. There is no conflict where the judge's financial or property interest is limited to one shared by citizens generally. Owning an insurance policy, having a bank account, using a credit card or owning securities in a widely held enterprise would not, in normal circumstances, constitute a conflict of interest, unless the outcome of the proceedings before the judge could substantially affect such holdings.

5.C.4 Dès leur nomination, les juges doivent immédiatement cesser de pratiquer le droit et devraient se départir, de façon définitive, de leurs intérêts dans toute activité commerciale ou d'affaires. Les liens existant avec leur cabinet devraient être rompus aussi rapidement que possible, idéalement de manière immédiate et définitive.

5.C.5 De manière générale, les juges peuvent détenir des placements « passifs » qui ne constituent pas « la poursuite d'une entreprise », en autant qu'il s'agisse de placements véritablement passifs exigeant peu ou pas de gestion active. Néanmoins, les juges ne devraient pas présider de procès qui mettent en jeu leur propre intérêt pécuniaire ou autre ou leur patrimoine ou dans lesquels leur intérêt pourrait susciter chez une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée la crainte qu'ils pourraient ne pas juger de façon impartiale. Ce principe s'applique aussi bien dans le cas où l'intérêt lui-même est l'objet du litige que dans celui où l'issue du procès pourrait avoir une incidence importante sur la valeur de tout intérêt ou bien appartenant au juge, à sa famille ou à des proches. Il n'y a généralement pas de conflit d'intérêts lorsque l'intérêt financier ou patrimonial du juge est équivalent à celui de la population en général. Ainsi, dans des circonstances normales, ne constituerait pas un conflit d'intérêts le fait de détenir une police d'assurance, d'avoir un compte bancaire, d'utiliser une carte de crédit ou de détenir des titres d'une société inscrite en bourse, à moins que le résultat du litige devant le juge ne puisse affecter substantiellement la valeur de ces intérêts.

Acting as Executors

5.C.6 Judges should not normally act as an executor or fiduciary, unless it concerns the affairs of a close friend or relative and is unlikely to become contentious. Even in that case, judges should not be remunerated for that role and should not act if the executorship may interfere with the performance of judicial duties.

Judges' Former Legal Practice

5.C.7 Judges should be sensitive to the existence of relationships which, to a reasonable and informed person, would give rise to reasonable apprehension of lack of impartiality. In particular, judges will face this issue in relation to cases involving former clients, members of the judge's former law firm or lawyers from the government department or legal aid office in which the judge practiced before appointment. Each case is unique and the apprehension of bias should be assessed in light of all the circumstances. The following general guidelines may be helpful: (i) judges who were involved in private practice should not sit on any case in which the judge or, to their knowledge, the judge's former firm was directly involved in any capacity before the judge was appointed to office; (ii) judges who practised law in government service or legal aid should not sit on cases in which they had any involvement prior to their appointment; (iii) judges should not sit on a matter in which the judge's former law firm is involved until after a 'cooling off period', often established by local law or tradition, of between two and five years; and, (iv) judges should not sit on a matter in which the judge's former law firm is involved for at least as long as there continues to be a financial relationship between the judge and the law firm.

Agir comme liquidateur

5.C.6 De manière générale, les juges ne devraient pas agir comme liquidateur d'une succession ou comme fiduciaire ou fondé de pouvoir, si ce n'est pour le bénéfice d'un ami proche ou d'un membre de leur famille, et à la condition qu'il soit peu probable que la situation devienne litigieuse. Même dans ce cas, les juges ne devraient pas être rémunérés pour cette tâche, laquelle ne devrait pas être acceptée si elle est susceptible de nuire à l'exercice des fonctions judiciaires.

Activités professionnelles antérieures

5.C.7 Les juges devraient être sensibles à l'existence de relations susceptibles de susciter, chez une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée, une crainte raisonnable quant à leur impartialité. Les juges devront parfois se demander s'il convient d'entendre des affaires qui impliquent d'anciens clients, des membres de leur ancien cabinet ou des avocats du ministère ou du bureau d'aide juridique dans lequel ils ont exercé avant leur accession à la magistrature. Chaque cas est unique et la crainte de partialité devrait être appréciée en fonction de toutes les circonstances. Les recommandations suivantes pourraient s'avérer utiles : (i) les juges qui exerçaient en pratique privée ne devraient pas entendre les litiges dans lesquels ils agissaient ou, à leur connaissance, leur ancien cabinet agissait à quelque titre que ce soit, avant leur accession à la magistrature; (ii) les juges qui exerçaient au sein de la fonction publique ou à l'aide juridique ne devraient pas entendre les litiges dans lesquels ils agissaient à quelque titre que ce soit avant leur accession à la magistrature; (iii) les juges ne devraient pas entendre les autres dossiers menés par leur ancien cabinet avant l'expiration d'une certaine période, souvent établie par la loi ou les usages locaux, de deux à cinq ans à compter de leur nomination, et (iv) les juges ne devraient pas entendre les dossiers menés par leur ancien cabinet au moins aussi longtemps que perdurent leurs relations financières avec celui-ci.

Personal Relationships

5.C.8 Frequently judges are faced with situations where the lawyer appearing before the judge is from a law firm where a close friend or member of the judge's immediate family is a partner, associate or employee. It would be inappropriate for a judge to hear a case involving a close friend or family member. Generally speaking, it would not be problematic for a judge to sit on a case involving a lawyer from a firm in which the close friend or family member is a member or employee, provided that the friend or family member has not been involved in the matter. However, there may be circumstances where it would be inappropriate for a judge to hear such a case. For example, where the law firm is very small (such that there is a greater risk of the perception of lack of impartiality) or where the law firm stands to gain or lose significantly by the outcome, such that the judge's decision would result in a monetary or reputational gain or loss to the close family member or friend or former colleague.

Judges in Financial Difficulty

5.C.9 Judges who are in financial difficulty should be particularly vigilant for conflicts of interest, both actual and perceived. Problems arise where judges in these circumstances preside over matters involving their creditors. Serious questions arise if any aspect of the judge's financial difficulties becomes contentious and the possibility of the judge appearing before a judicial colleague as a party or a witness could arise. The actual day-to-day impact of the financial difficulties on the judge's ability to perform the job will obviously vary considerably depending on the circumstances.

Relations personnelles

5.C.8 Il arrive fréquemment que les juges entendent des affaires où l'une des parties est représentée par un cabinet au sein duquel un ami proche ou un membre de leur famille immédiate pratique le droit ou est employé. Il serait inapproprié que des juges entendent des affaires impliquant des membres de leur famille immédiate ou des amis proches. De manière générale, il n'est pas inapproprié qu'un juge entende une affaire où l'une des parties est représentée par un avocat appartenant au même cabinet qu'un ami proche ou un membre de leur famille, pour autant que cette personne n'ait pas participé au dossier. Néanmoins, cette situation pourrait devenir problématique dans certaines circonstances, comme lorsque le cabinet est très petit (accroissant le risque que le juge soit perçu comme manquant d'impartialité) ou lorsque l'enjeu du litige est susceptible de profiter ou de nuire grandement au cabinet, de telle sorte que la décision du juge puisse entraîner un gain ou une perte pécuniaire pour le membre de la famille immédiate, l'ami ou l'ancien collègue ou être favorable ou défavorable à sa réputation.

Les juges en difficulté financière

5.C.9 Les juges qui éprouvent des difficultés financières devraient prendre particulièrement garde aux conflits d'intérêts, tant réels qu'apparents. Des problèmes surviennent lorsque des juges, dans de telles circonstances, président des procès dont l'objet concerne un de leurs créanciers. De graves questions se poseront si un aspect ou un autre des difficultés financières du juge devient litigieux et qu'il est possible que le juge soit forcé de comparaître devant un collègue à titre de partie ou de témoin. Il est difficile de systématiser les conséquences réelles des difficultés financières des juges sur leur capacité d'accomplir quotidiennement leur tâche; ces conséquences varieront selon les circonstances.

Disclosure and Consent

5.C.10 In certain situations, it may be appropriate for a judge to make disclosure of a potential conflict and invite submissions from the parties. However, judges, not the parties or their counsel, bear the burden of ensuring respect for the principle of judicial impartiality. Neither disclosure of a conflict of interest nor the consent of the parties necessarily justifies judges ignoring circumstances which reasonably call into question their ability to hear a case and decide impartially.

Extraordinary Circumstances: Interests of Justice

5.C.11 Extraordinary or urgent circumstances may require judges to weigh the requirements of judicial impartiality against the risk of injustice.

5.C.12 Circumstances which might cause only minor inconvenience to a large court might nonetheless have a significant practical impact on a smaller court. Judges should organize their private affairs to minimize the potential for such conflicts.

Divulgation et consentement

5.C.10 Il peut être approprié pour un juge de divulguer l'existence d'une situation de conflit d'intérêts potentiel et d'inviter les parties à faire des représentations à ce sujet. C'est effectivement aux juges, plutôt qu'aux parties ou à leurs avocats, qu'il incombe de faire respecter le principe d'impartialité. Ni la divulgation du conflit d'intérêts ni le consentement des parties ne permettent forcément aux juges d'ignorer les circonstances dans lesquelles une personne raisonnable pourrait craindre que l'affaire ne puisse être entendue ou jugée de manière impartiale.

Circonstances extraordinaires : intérêt de la justice

5.C.11 Des circonstances extraordinaires ou urgentes peuvent exiger que les juges cherchent un équilibre entre le principe l'impartialité judiciaire et la nécessité d'éviter une injustice.

5.C.12 Les circonstances qui pourraient n'entraîner que de légers inconvénients pour une juridiction de grande taille pourraient avoir de graves répercussions pour un tribunal de moindre envergure. Les juges devraient organiser leurs affaires personnelles de manière à atténuer le risque que surviennent de tels conflits.

Public Education Activities

5.D.1 Judges possess significant knowledge of the law and the legal system. For this reason, they should make reasonable efforts to become engaged in informing and educating the public regarding the rule of law and the role of judges and courts in the administration of justice. Chief Justices have particular responsibilities and opportunities in relation to such public engagement, including public communications on behalf of their courts.

5.D.2 Subject to the limitations imposed by s. 55 of the Judges Act and these Ethical Principles, judicial participation in law reform or other scholarly or educational activities are not discouraged, provided that such involvement does not include participation in campaigns in support of, or the championing of, law reform initiatives.

Éducation du public

5.D.1 Les juges connaissent à fond le droit et le système de justice. Pour cette raison, ils devraient s'efforcer dans la mesure du possible d'informer et de renseigner le public sur la primauté du droit et le rôle des juges et des tribunaux dans l'administration de la justice. À cet égard, les juges en chef ont une responsabilité accrue, y compris pour ce qui concerne les communications qui émanent de leur cour.

5.D.2 Sous réserve des restrictions imposées par l'article 55 de la Loi sur les juges et par les Principes de déontologie, la participation des juges à des travaux de réforme du droit et à d'autres activités de recherche ou d'éducation n'est pas découragée, pour autant qu'elle n'inclue pas la contribution à des campagnes de soutien à des initiatives de réforme du droit ou la promotion de telles initiatives.

Post-Judicial Careers[9]

5.E.1 Judges may choose to move on to another career after leaving the bench. This raises several ethical considerations. One issue relates to the situation of judges prior to departure from judicial office. There may well be circumstances in which planning for one's post-judicial career undermines the perception of impartiality a judge should maintain. Discussions, negotiations or proposals of employment with a law firm, a prospective employer who is a litigant before the judge or a party in a case where the judge has delivered a judgment, may create the impression of a conflict of interest. The same concern exists where a judge is soliciting such opportunities. Whether the overture comes from the judge or the prospective employer, there is a risk that the judge's self-interest and duty would appear to conflict in the eyes of a reasonable and informed person. Accordingly, judges should refrain from engaging in such conversations before their judicial term has come to an end.

9 Canadian Judicial Council Position on Former Judges Returning to Practice (2017)

Carrière post-judiciaire[9]

5.E.1 Il est possible que des juges amorcent une nouvelle carrière après avoir quitté la magistrature. Cette situation soulève plusieurs enjeux éthiques. Un premier type de préoccupation concerne la situation des juges pendant la période qui précède leur départ de la magistrature. Les gestes posés par les juges dans la planification de leur carrière post-judiciaire peuvent, dans certaines circonstances, porter atteinte à l'apparence d'impartialité qu'ils devraient maintenir. Les discussions ou négociations relatives à un emploi avec un cabinet d'avocats ou un autre employeur éventuel qui est partie à une affaire en cours ou à un litige tranché par le juge pourraient susciter une apparence de conflit d'intérêts. La même inquiétude s'attache aux expressions d'intérêt ou propositions qui pourraient être faites par les juges auprès d'employeurs éventuels. Que les invitations discrètes émanent des juges ou de l'employeur éventuel, une personne raisonnable et bien renseignée pourrait y voir un conflit entre l'intérêt personnel du juge et son devoir. Par conséquent, les juges devraient éviter de participer à de telles conversations avant que leurs fonctions judiciaires n'aient pris fin.

9 Conseil canadien de la magistrature, Position sur les anciens juges qui reprennent l'exercice du droit après avoir quitté la magistrature (2017)

5.E.2 The situation of the judge upon leaving judicial office also introduces ethical considerations. Where former judges are professionally active, their conduct can have an impact on the public's perception of the judiciary as a whole. Accordingly, former judges should be attentive to the ways in which their post-judicial actions or activities could undermine public confidence in the judiciary. Former judges are able to return to the legal profession, but there are limits to the types of activities in which they can engage, consistent with the preservation of the principle of impartiality. A former judge could act as an arbitrator, mediator or commissioner. However, former judges should not appear as counsel before a court or tribunal in Canada. Appearance as counsel is broader than physical appearance. While it is appropriate for former judges to review or draft legal arguments and pleadings, to provide advice to counsel and parties, a former judge should not stand, speak or appear as counsel in court or before a tribunal or sign legal documents that are or may be the subject of proceedings before a court or tribunal. This constraint may be subject to exceptions where a judge has left the judiciary after a very short time.

5.E.3 Former judges should exercise appropriate caution in accepting retainers and providing legal advice in high profile or politically contentious matters where it can be anticipated that a client may make use of the judge's former status to advance the client's interests.

5.E.4 Former judges should not disclose the confidential discussions among judges – for example, the deliberations of an appellate court – or discuss anything that gives the appearance of relying on confidential information or judicial confidences.

5.E.2 La situation des juges qui quittent la magistrature soulève également des considérations éthiques. La conduite des juges qui retournent à la vie professionnelle peut affecter la perception qu'a le public de la magistrature dans son ensemble. Les anciens juges devraient être sensibles au fait que leurs activités ou actions pourraient miner la confiance du public à l'endroit de la magistrature. Les juges peuvent réintégrer la profession juridique à l'issue de leur carrière judiciaire, mais certaines restrictions s'appliquent aux types d'activités qui s'ouvrent à eux afin que soit préservé le principe d'impartialité. Les anciens juges peuvent exercer des fonctions d'arbitre, de médiateur ou de commissaire. Néanmoins, ils ne devraient pas comparaître en tant qu'avocat devant une cour ou un tribunal au Canada. La comparution en tant qu'avocat va au-delà de la comparution en personne. Bien qu'il soit approprié pour un ancien juge de rédiger ou de réviser des documents juridiques ou des actes de procédure, ou de donner des conseils aux avocats et aux parties, ils ne devraient pas plaider devant une cour de justice ou un tribunal, ni apposer leur signature sur un document juridique dont l'objet est ou pourrait être lié à une instance. Il est possible que des exceptions à ce principe soient admises à l'égard de juges qui ont quitté la magistrature très peu de temps après leur nomination.

5.E.3 Les anciens juges devraient faire preuve de la prudence requise avant d'accepter un mandat et de donner des conseils juridiques lorsque le client est susceptible d'utiliser l'ancien statut du juge comme levier pour faire avancer ses intérêts dans un dossier controversé sur le terrain politique ou une affaire qui attire beaucoup d'attention sur la scène publique.

5.E.4 D'autre part, les anciens juges ne devraient pas révéler la teneur des discussions confidentielles auxquelles ils ont participé – en tant que membre d'une formation d'une cour d'appel, par exemple – ou révéler quoi que ce soit qui puisse donner à croire qu'ils s'appuient sur des informations confidentielles ou liées au secret judiciaire.

JUSTICE ET FAITS DIVERS

Entrevue avec la juge en chef de la Cour supérieure

« Tout tient avec du duct tape »

Marie-Anne Paquette, juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec

« On a l'intime sentiment que tout tient avec du duct tape. Ça prend au moins un miracle par jour pour réussir à fonctionner. »

C’est l’implacable diagnostic du système judiciaire que fait Marie-Anne Paquette, nouvelle juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec, dans sa première grande entrevue. Pendant que des procès sont régulièrement reportés par manque de juges, Ottawa tarde à pourvoir les 12 postes vacants et à créer la dizaine de nouveaux postes réclamés par la juge en chef.

LOUIS-SAMUEL PERRON
La Presse

Son immense bureau trône au sommet du palais de justice de Montréal. La vue sur le Vieux-Port y est imprenable. La juge en chef s’excuse d’emblée pour ses étagères toujours vides, où elle expose fièrement le portrait de ses trois filles. C’est que la nouvelle patronne de la Cour supérieure avait d’autres priorités depuis son entrée en poste en juin dernier : moderniser la justice et la magistrature. Un défi titanesque qui n’effraie pas cette femme élevée sur une ferme, et que rien ne destinait au droit.

La juge en chef brosse un portrait sombre, mais lucide de notre système judiciaire actuel, qui tient grâce à des « miracles » quotidiens et où la « futurologie » règne en l’absence de données fiables. « On veut améliorer les délais, mais on est obligés de faire des choses à l’aveugle. Il nous manque tellement de données sur l’activité judiciaire ! », s’exaspère la juge en chef.

Mais surtout, elle décrit un système qui ne respecte pas ses promesses envers la population. En juin dernier, un procès sur quatre au civil a dû être remis pour « encombrement » à la Cour supérieure, car plusieurs procès étaient fixés au même moment.

« C'est dramatique », lâche la juge en chef, en se montrant empathique envers ces citoyens qui n'ont « pas dormi de la nuit » et qui ont « investi un temps fou » dans leur dossier. « On leur fait faux bond », se désole-t-elle. Le taux d'encombrement est ensuite descendu à 7 %, puis à 4,7 % pendant l'automne. Mais pour la juge en chef, ce n'est pas une « amélioration » : le seul taux « acceptable » est de 0 %.

« On ne peut pas faire ça à la population ! », s'exclame-t-elle.

La cause « directe » est le retard d'Ottawa pour pourvoir les 12 postes de juges vacants à la Cour supérieure, explique Marie-Anne Paquette. Diplomate, elle s'abstient de critiquer Ottawa et assure que le fédéral met « les bouchées doubles » pour « corriger » la situation.

En plus des 12 postes vacants, la juge en chef demande au gouvernement Trudeau de créer 9 nouveaux postes pour « bien servir la population ». Une demande déjà approuvée « intégralement » par Québec, se réjouit-elle. La balle est maintenant dans le camp d'Ottawa.

« Bris de service »

Avec un déficit de 21 juges, les impacts sont réels pour le public. Dans un district en périphérie de Montréal, aucun juge n'a pu se libérer pour siéger les deux seules journées prévues dans le mois, illustre Marie-Anne Paquette.

La Cour supérieure a relevé pas moins de 29 « bris de service » pour manque de juge en septembre et octobre derniers, et 13 en raison du manque de personnel ou d'un dossier incomplet. La situation est certainement pire puisque ces données sont « imparfaites », nuance la juge en chef.

La juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec, Marie-Anne Paquette, déplore notamment l'absence de données fiables sur le système judiciaire.

« Ça n'a pas lieu d'être ! Il y a n'a pas de taux acceptable de bris de service », insiste-t-elle, en montrant du doigt les salaires non compétitifs des employés du greffe et du soutien à la magistrature. Les adjointes des juges quittent ainsi la Cour supérieure pour travailler à la cour municipale ou au privé. Résultat : le tiers des magistrats n'a pas l'aide requise.

Un problème qui pèse lourd sur les épaules des juges, obligés de se consacrer à ces tâches administratives « extrêmement importantes ». « Je dois vous confier que cette surcharge, occasionnée par la pénurie de main-d'œuvre, entre parfois en concurrence avec la sérénité qui est nécessaire à l'exercice de nos fonctions », avoue la juge en chef.

> « On a brûlé vraiment beaucoup de carburant quand on arrive sur le banc après avoir fait toutes sortes de tâches qui devraient être confiées à d'autres gens. [...] Ce n'est pas une question de snobisme. »
> — Marie-Anne Paquette, juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec

Comme à l'égard d'Ottawa, la juge en chef refuse de jeter le blâme sur Québec pour cette crise. Elle assure que le Conseil du trésor fournit « énormément » d'efforts pour corriger la situation.

De la ferme au palais

La juge en chef a un parcours hors du commun, ayant grandi sur une ferme laitière à Mirabel. « Je ne viens pas d'un milieu d'universitaires, mais d'un milieu agricole. Il n'y a pas grand-chose qui me destinait au droit », confie-t-elle. Ses parents ont été expropriés à l'époque de la construction de l'aéroport. Un bouleversement qui l'a marquée à vie.

« Ça a appelé chez moi un désir de connaître ces règles. Est-ce qu'on doit systématiquement accepter les choses comme elles sont ? Je pense que c'est ça qui m'a amenée vers le droit », s'ouvre Marie-Anne Paquette. Dans un milieu où l'on est souvent avocat de père en fils, la fille de fermiers a vite intégré l'idée qu'elle n'aurait « pas de deuxième chance », poursuit-elle.

Nommée juge en 2010, puis juge coordonnatrice, elle atteint le prestigieux poste de juge en chef de la Cour supérieure en juin 2022. Néanmoins, pas question de se reposer sur ses lauriers.

Marie-Anne Paquette parle avec détermination de son cheval de bataille : le dossier numérique, prochaine révolution du système judiciaire.

Selon elle, le dossier numérique permettra notamment de mieux colliger les données sur les délais judiciaires – et donc de poser des actions pour les réduire.

« On ne peut plus continuer d'opérer avec un dossier papier », martèle la juge en chef. D'ailleurs, elle refuse d'envisager la possibilité que cette réforme menée par le ministère québécois de la Justice tombe à l'eau. « On n'a pas le choix », répète-t-elle. La livraison est prévue en 2025. Des centaines de millions de dollars sont investis par Québec dans l'ambitieux programme Lexius.

Des choix difficiles à venir

Les délais judiciaires au criminel sont comparables à ceux d'il y a quatre ans, se réjouit la juge en chef. Un procès devant jury peut être fixé dans un délai de 10 à 13 mois.

« Il y a beaucoup de miracles derrière ça, beaucoup d'ingéniosité, puis beaucoup de duct tape », nuance-t-elle.

Marie-Anne Paquette a été nommée juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec le 6 juin 2022.

Or, les délais qui explosent en Cour du Québec, en raison notamment de la réforme de l'horaire des juges, finissent par avoir un impact sur ceux de la Cour supérieure. Les dossiers qui proviennent de la Cour du Québec sont « vieillissants », ce qui « réduit » sa marge de manœuvre, soutient Marie-Anne Paquette. Le plafond dicté par l'arrêt Jordan est de 30 mois en Cour supérieure.

> « Encore une fois, si on était capable d'avoir accès à des statistiques, on pourrait dresser des tendances. On pourrait obtenir des extrapolations, puis dire quand sera le point de rupture. Mais on navigue à l'aveugle. »
> — Marie-Anne Paquette, juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec

Au civil, le délai pour la fixation d'un procès est stable à un an et trois mois. Or, un choix devra être fait si de nouveaux juges ne sont pas nommés, prévient la patronne de la Cour supérieure. « Nos délais vont rallonger, mais au moins, on va être sûr que la journée où les gens vont se présenter, on va être capable de les servir. Avec la pénurie d'effectifs, on fait face à ce dilemme », affirme-t-elle.

La Cour d'appel a révélé en mars dernier l'existence d'un « procès secret » qui s'est vraisemblablement déroulé en Cour du Québec contre un informateur de police. Une affaire qui a semé la consternation dans la classe politique et judiciaire.

Un tel « procès secret » pourrait-il se dérouler dans son propre tribunal ? La juge en chef Paquette répond avec fermeté : « Ce que je peux vous dire, c'est qu'il n'y en a pas à la Cour supérieure. »

Top judges decry Ottawa's appointment delays; application vetting defunct in B.C., Toronto, N.S.

By Cristin Schmitz

Law360 Canada (May 9, 2023, 5:01 PM EDT) -- As Canada's top judges again raise their voices about Ottawa's chronic and lengthy delays in appointing superior court judges — causing cancelled trials, judicial burnout and wasted time and expense for litigants — the Liberal government has allowed more than one-third of its judicial vetting committees to collapse.

As of May 1, 2023, the number of vacancies in the superior trial and appellate courts of the nation had climbed to nine per cent (88 of 995 full-time positions), according to the website of the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

Some of those vacant judicial positions date back as much as 18 months, and most date back many months, according to information obtained by Law360 Canada from several major trial courts.

Meanwhile, a Law360 Canada review of the federal judicial affairs commissioner's website indicates six of the 17 federal Judicial Advisory Committees (JACs) have collapsed because the federal government has not appointed new members to take over from the incumbents, whose terms lapsed — a repeat problem that the Trudeau government has failed to rectify since the Liberals first formed government in 2015.

According to information provided by the commissioner's office to Law360 Canada, the JAC for Yukon expired more than a year ago (April 30, 2022), while the JACs for Nova Scotia and P.E.I expired more than seven months ago (Sept. 30, 2022).

Notably, on April 30, 2023 the JACs for Ontario's Greater Toronto Area and for British Columbia — which screen applicants for two of Canada's biggest, busiest and backlogged superior trial courts — became defunct — as did the specialized JAC for the Tax Court of Canada.

The inordinately high number of current judicial vacancies last month prompted the Canadian Judicial Council, comprising the 44 chief- and associate chief justices of the country's superior trial and appellate courts, to publicly decry the crisis in the administration of justice — for the third time in seven months — via a public communique in which judicial leaders "reiterated their concerns about the need for more timely judicial appointments and the impact that vacancies have on court operations."

In a blunt follow-up letter May 3 from the CJC's chair to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, Supreme Court of Canada Chief Justice Richard Wagner pointed out that some courts routinely operate with vacancy rates of 10 to 15 per cent, with appointments taking many months.

"The situation could undermine Canadians' confidence in the justice system and in all democratic institutions, because a growing number of criminal and civil cases are at risk of falling apart," the chief justice warned, as reported by the CBC May 9. "The current situation is untenable and I am worried that it will create a crisis in our justice system, which is already facing multiple challenges," the chief justice wrote in the letter obtained by CBC. "Access to justice and the health of our democratic institutions are at risk."

The chief justice said that federal Justice Minister David Lametti has been trying his best to address the shortage of judges.

"It is imperative for the Prime Minister's Office to give this issue the importance it deserves and for appointments to be made in a timely manner," the chief justice of Canada emphasized. "The government's inertia regarding vacancies and the absence of satisfactory explanations for these delays are disconcerting."

Chief Justice of British Columbia Robert Bauman

Chief Justice of British Columbia Robert Bauman told Law360 Canada in Ottawa after the CJC's spring meeting in late April, that the federal judiciary's "plea coincides with a particularly difficult time for a number of the courts across the country" with respect to judicial appointments.

The fallout from so many vacancies includes last-minute trial cancellations, consequent wasted time, energy and expense for litigants, long delays for court hearings and increased pressure on the short-staffed benches, Chief Justice Bauman explained. "The problem seems to be more acute today than it has been historically," he remarked. "There's always going to be a certain number of vacancies in any court, retirements and resignations being what they are. But now we seem to be particularly vexed by more vacancies than we can easily manage, that has then attendant pressures on other judges and on court schedulers, etc.," he said. "We know the stress of judicial proceedings is intense, and [a high judicial vacancy rate] exacerbates it, and we also know that that results in ... the [litigants'] costs of preparation that are thrown away, but have to be repeated. So it's a serious problem."

The problem is certainly serious in British Columbia's Supreme Court which was contending with 12 vacancies on a court with 95 full-time posts — a 13-per-cent vacancy rate (as of May 1).

The two oldest vacancies (in Abbotsford, B.C.) date back to November 2021 and January 2022, according to B.C. Supreme Court information provided to Law360 Canada.

Eight more full-time B.C. Supreme Court vacancies (including three unfilled full-time positions that were added to the judicial complement) also arose last year, beginning in June 2022.

Half of the B.C. vacancies arose as a result of judges electing supernumerary (part-time) status, meaning the federal government knew well in advance that they would be leaving full-time work.

"All of the justices provided five to six months' notice of the date on which they elected to become a supernumerary judge," B.C. Superior Courts' spokesperson Bruce Cohen told Law360 Canada.

Cohen said the delay from a vacancy to appointment "generally ranges from a low of three months to a high of nine months; however, there are currently significant outliers."

He noted the three additions to the Supreme Court's complement, which were added in order to address workload pressures, "have gone unfilled for well over a year."

In Ontario's Superior Court of Justice, judges provide, by convention, six months' notice of their departure from full-time work.

Yet the delays in appointments to Canada's largest superior trial court are also substantial. Two-thirds of its vacancies have languished in the range of, at a minimum more than four months, up to 18 months and counting, according to information provided by the court to Law360 Canada.

As of May 1, there was a nine -per-cent vacancy rate in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice — 21 of 224 full-time posts (not including family court) were vacant. The three earliest superior court vacancies date back to November and December 2021. Thirteen vacancies date back to 2022.

The vacancy problems are likely to worsen since, as of May 1, the judicial advisory committees for the Greater Toronto Area and for British Columbia also became moribund, leaving the superior trial courts which rely on them to vet and create a sufficient pool of candidates for the bench desperately awaiting appointments.

"I don't know why it takes so long in some cases to appoint [JACs] after terms expire," Chief Justice Bauman told Law360 Canada. "But the lack of a timely-appointed JAC obviously delays the appointment process because eligible candidates for appointment must first get through the responsible JAC and only such eligible candidates make up the pool of candidates available for appointment."

Kerry Simmons, CBA British Columbia

The executive director of the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Bar Association, Kerry Simmons, told Law360 Canada that the CBA-B.C supplied its nominee for the now-defunct B.C. JAC to the federal government last March.

"We need to have the JACs working," Simmons stressed. "Any delay in appointing them means that no review of applications can happen, so it will then further delay [judicial] appointments if the JACs are not operational."

Simmons noted it is possible to design a more timely and efficient judicial appointment process, pointing to the example of the appointment system for British Columbia's Provincial Court. "Our province has a timely process right now," she remarked.

The hiatus in the operations of many non-partisan JACs as they await the justice minister's appointment of new members — a recurrent phenomenon — is only one possible contributor to the decades-old problem of untimely federal judicial appointments.

However, the federal government declines to explain just what causes its persistent delays in appointing judges. Politics and consultation are said to play a role as cabinet members, MPs and others weigh in on candidates for the various vacancies. There may also be a bottleneck within the Prime Minister's Office, where a handful of officials vet federal appointments.

Asked why the persistent federal delays in appointing judges, Lametti told a scrum on Parliament Hill May 9 “we try to appoint judges at the necessary speed.”

Justice Minister David Lametti

Lametti noted the Liberal government has created more than 100 new judicial positions, while he has appointed almost 400 since his appointment as minister of justice in 2019. “Our government has appointed more than 600,” he said, since the Liberals took office in 2015. “So we’re working hard. We had two [federal] elections in between.”

Lametti acknowledged the serious consequences that lengthy vacancies can have on court operations, and for the fair trial Charter rights of accused, who the Supreme Court of Canada has said must generally be tried within 30 months in superior court.

“It’s a serious problem, and we’re attacking the problem,” Lametti said, without providing any details on how he is doing so. “I understand the problem. I’m working very hard with people across the country to make this system work.”

The justice minister noted that “there are different blockages from time to time at different points in the system.”

In some regions, for example, there may be too few applicants in the approved pool of judicial candidates to fit the requirements for the vacant posts, notwithstanding that Lametti and the judiciary of a number of courts have been reaching out to encourage applications from qualified lawyers.

“We are pushing to get people to apply in certain parts of the country more than others,” Lametti said.

His director of communications, David Taylor, told Law360 Canada the defunct JACs "will be reconstituted in due course. Going forward, we are considering extending the [two-year] terms of the JAC, as well as the assessment period of applications from two to three years. In the meantime, we are fortunate to have a good list of screened applications in most jurisdictions."

With respect to the vacancies in both Ontario and British Columbia, Taylor said the federal justice minister "has spoken with members of the judiciary as well as the bar to encourage more people to apply for the bench."

"Our government continues to make appointments at a steady rate, and we expect the number of vacancies will continue to decline," Taylor said by email. "We will ensure our appointment process remains open, transparent and merit based."

Both the bench and bar have long decried what then-Supreme Court of Canada Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin publicly denounced in 2016 as the "perpetual crisis" in filling superior court vacancies typical of federal governments of both political stripes. She told the Canadian Bar Association "there is something deeply wrong with a hiring scheme that repeatedly proves itself incapable of foreseeing, preparing for and filling vacancies as they arise."

Judicial appointment delays are "eminently fixable," she told Law360 Canada at the time, particularly as judicial retirements are usually known, or anticipated, months in advance by the government. "If you were running a corporation you'd figure out who you need in place in advance, and that would be filled," she said. "Otherwise you would be suffering detrimental effects, and you'd be losing money. In this case we're suffering detrimental effects, but the impact is on the people who are not getting their cases heard."

Chief Justice of Canada Richard Wagner

Chief Justice Wagner highlighted the problem again last February in a speech to the Canadian Bar Association where he urged the federal government to move on filling the unusually high number of judicial vacancies across the country (echoing a CJC plea in September 2022). The Canadian Bar Association also wrote federal Lametti last January, underscoring the need for timely appoints to the federal benches and the JACs.

Chief Justice Bauman said there are presently relatively "fewer willing applicants" for the B.C. Supreme Court's vacancies.

"We're not sure why that's so, but it is so," the chief justice of British Columbia said, noting that Lametti, B.C. Supreme Court Chief Justice Christopher Hinkson and the B.C. bar association and law society are "all concerned, and are all reaching out to bring home that fact to the bar in British Columbia to encourage qualified applicants."

Ottawa's chronic delays in appointing federal judges has had dire consequences on the ground, as detailed by the B.C. Supreme Court in its annual report for the 2022 calendar year.

"The court continues to have to bump a large number of long chambers applications and trials compared to historical averages, which has been a trend since 2019," the superior trial court reported this year. "The main cause of bumping continues to be the shortage of judges available to hear matters, as the court does not have enough judges to meet the demand for hearings and trials. ... In 2022, 10.9 per cent of all long chambers applications in British Columbia were bumped, which was slightly lower than the bumping rates in 2019 through 2021, but well above the average in the years preceding that," the court said. "In Vancouver specifically, the bumping rate for long chambers applications in 2022 was slightly lower than in 2021, but higher than in 2020 and the years leading up to 2019. More trials were bumped in 2022 than in 2021 in British Columbia, with 16.3 per cent bumped in 2022 compared to 13.5 per cent the year before."

La Cour supérieure dépend de « miracles » au quotidien pour gérer la pénurie de juges

La juge en chef rappelle que les citoyens qui dépendent des tribunaux pour régler des causes civiles souffrent aussi du manque de juges à l'échelle nationale.

Le manque de juges cause une série de drames « inacceptables » pour les familles qui se retrouvent devant les tribunaux à des moments particulièrement troublants ou traumatisants de leur vie, affirme la juge en chef de la Cour supérieure du Québec, Marie-Anne Paquette.

En entrevue à Radio-Canada, elle raconte qu'une famille en pleine séparation acrimonieuse a appris qu'elle devra attendre 19 mois avant que les questions d'autorité parentale et de pension alimentaire soient entendues par la Cour supérieure.

« L'enfant a quatre ans aujourd'hui. Il va en avoir six quand on va le revoir pour déterminer comment papa et maman auraient dû gérer leur coparentalité », dénonce-t-elle. « C'est 19 mois de situation intenable pour les parents et pour les enfants. »

Ces problèmes sont la conséquence directe de la pénurie de juges au sein des tribunaux du pays, une situation que vient de dénoncer le juge en chef du Canada, Richard Wagner, dans une lettre adressée au premier ministre Justin Trudeau.

À l'échelle nationale, il y a 85 postes de juge vacants sur environ 1200 au sein des différentes juridictions de compétence fédérale.

« Je suis très heureuse de cette initiative que le juge en chef a prise. Mais je suis malheureuse que cette initiative soit nécessaire », affirme la juge en chef Paquette.

Environ 90 % des causes entendues par la Cour supérieure du Québec sont de nature civile, souvent dans des situations de séparation ou de divorce, de perte d'emploi ou de conflits commerciaux, rappelle la magistrate.

Le juge en chef de la Cour suprême, Richard Wagner, s'inquiète de voir fléchir la confiance du public envers la justice en raison de cette pénurie.

Une autre conséquence négative de la pénurie de juges est le risque d'une multiplication des arrêts de procédures dans des dossiers criminels.

En raison de l'arrêt Jordan prononcé par la Cour suprême du Canada en 2016, les dossiers de nature pénale doivent être réglés dans un délai maximal de 30 mois, à moins de circonstances exceptionnelles.

> « Pour l'instant, les choses sont sous contrôle, mais ça tient à des miracles. »
> — Marie-Anne Paquette, juge en chef de la Cour supérieure

« On manœuvre avec les moyens du bord et avec le proverbial duct tape. »

Délai sans précédent

La juge en chef Paquette note que le gouvernement fédéral n'a toujours pas pourvu le poste laissé vacant en mars 2022 par le décès de la juge en chef adjointe Eva Petra.

> « Ça semble être un record de délai à combler ce type de poste-là, mais ce n'est pas le genre de record qu'on aime détenir. »
> — Marie-Anne Paquette, juge en chef de la Cour supérieure

Il y a officiellement trois autres postes vacants au sein de la Cour supérieure du Québec, sans compter le fait que quatre juges devraient prendre leur retraite au cours des prochains mois.

De plus, la Cour supérieure a évalué qu'elle a besoin de neuf postes de juge supplémentaires pour s'acquitter de toutes ses obligations, un constat que partage le gouvernement du Québec.

En tout, dans ce contexte, la juge en chef Paquette voudrait qu'Ottawa nomme 17 nouveaux juges à court terme à la Cour supérieure du Québec.

Pourtant, le processus de nomination à la magistrature bloque à Ottawa. Par conséquent, la Cour doit faire des « prouesses » pour éviter que des causes au criminel tombent en raison de l'arrêt Jordan ou que les dossiers civils s'enlisent.

« Le rythme des nominations ne suit pas celui des départs », lance-t-elle.

Un gouvernement qui « néglige ses responsabilités »

De son côté, le Bloc québécois accuse le gouvernement de négliger encore une fois ses responsabilités de base.

« La responsabilité de nommer ces juges revient à Ottawa et à personne d'autre. Mais encore une fois, comme ce fut le cas pour les passeports, comme c'est le cas pour l'immigration et pour l'assurance-emploi, le fédéral manque à remplir ses fonctions les plus élémentaires », avance le député bloquiste Rhéal Fortin.

Le ministre fédéral de la Justice, David Lametti, a réagi en affirmant qu'il est d'accord avec les constats du juge en chef Wagner, qui souligne que la pénurie de juges pourrait miner la réputation de toutes les institutions démocratiques au Canada.

« Je suis tout à fait en accord. C'est un problème sérieux, on s'attaque au problème », a expliqué David Lametti.

Il a ajouté que son gouvernement a nommé plus de 600 juges depuis 2015 et qu'il a aussi créé une centaine de postes de juge supplémentaires qu'il travaille « avec acharnement » à pourvoir.

New justice minister appoints more than a dozen judges in effort to address vacancies

There will be 77 vacancies in federally appointed judicial positions across the country as of Sept. 1

Justice Minister Arif Virani announced the appointment of more than a dozen judges Monday to fill some of the many vacancies in Canada's judicial system.

Fourteen provincial and territorial judges have been appointed: five in Manitoba (four of which are promotions), four in Ontario and one each in Saskatchewan, B.C., Alberta, Nunavut, and Newfoundland and Labrador. Virani also appointed one Federal Court judge.

For months, Supreme Court Chief Justice Richard Wagner has been urging the government to speed up the appointment process.

Wagner wrote a letter to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau in May warning that a shortage of judges in the federal court system is putting criminal trials at risk.

"The current situation is untenable and I am worried that it will create a crisis in our justice system, which is already facing multiple challenges. Access to justice and the health of our democratic institutions are at risk," Wagner wrote.

The Supreme Court's 2016 R. v. Jordan decision dictated that trials should finish either 18 or 30 months after a person is charged, depending on the type of trial.

The court ruled that unreasonable delays must lead to proceedings being stayed, which effectively means a trial does not go forward.

Wagner said some accused are being allowed to walk away because a shortage of judges means cases aren't being heard in a timely manner.

Virani promised to speed up judicial appointments when he took on the justice portfolio in July's cabinet shuffle.

"We need to be doing things, not compromising on quality, but we need to be doing things expeditiously," he told the Canadian Press at the time.

Virani said one of the first briefings he received in his new job was on judicial vacancies. One of the issues the government is dealing with is a shortage of applicants, he said.

"That's a bit frustrating when we want to appoint judges [who are] also reflective of the diversity of Canada, which is important to me and important to the prime minister," he said.

The federal government appoints judges to the federal courts, the superior courts of the provinces and territories and the Supreme Court of Canada.

A spokesperson for Virani's office said that as of Sept. 1, there will be 77 vacancies out of roughly 1,200 federally appointed judicial spots. The spokesperson said that vacancies remain elevated due to a large number of retirements.

"Minister Virani will continue to make high quality diverse appointments and the number of vacancies will decline," the spokesperson said in a media statement. They added Virani has now appointed 18 judges since he was sworn in as justice minister.

B.C. provincial court judges to receive 28.4% pay increase over four years

B.C. Attorney General Niki Sharma pauses while responding to questions outside B.C. Supreme Court in Vancouver on Monday, Nov. 27, 2023. Sharma says the government agrees that the raises given to provincial court judges and Crown prosecutors "is too much." DARRYL DYCK, THE CANADIAN PRESS

B.C.'s provincial court judges will receive a 28.4 per cent salary increase over the next four years.

The province's 131 full-time provincial court judges are now being paid $343,000, up from the $288,500 annual salary they had earned since April 1, 2022, the Ministry of the Attorney General confirmed this week.

The increase is retroactive to April 1, 2023, and the 131 full-time provincial court judges will also receive interest on that retroactive increase, the ministry said.

Although the province recommended smaller increases amounting to about 16 per cent over the next four years, the province did not challenge the 28.4 increase recommended by the 2022 Judicial Compensation Commission for the period April 1, 2023, to March 31, 2027. This means the recommendations from the final report of the commission, tabled in the legislature on Nov. 28, have come into force.

The government has rejected the commission's recommendations four times in the past — in 2010, 2013, 2016 and 2019 — resulting in legal action. The province is in court right now appealing the most recent court ruling setting out the limits on the province's ability to alter decisions made by the commission.

"We agree that it's too much. We made submissions to have lower increases that were rejected by the commission," Attorney General Niki Sharma said Thursday.

"Given the state of law on this issue, the province did not want to risk even more public money tied up in expensive lawsuits that were unlikely to succeed. This is an old process that has been in place for a long time. It's clearly not working for people. The province will be taking a look at the way judges' salaries are set in B.C. to ensure it meets people's expectations."

Crown counsel will also receive a 28.4 per cent increase over the next four years under their collective agreement. Senior Crown prosecutors are now making $291,000, an increase from $244,000 last year.

The commission also recommended that judicial justices receive a 37.7 per cent increase over the next four years. Judicial justices, who preside over search warrants, traffic and ticket violations and bail hearings outside court hours, now receive an annual salary of $172,000 which will increase to $187,000 in 2026-27.

In April, the B.C. General Employees' Union announced its members would received an increase of 6.75 per cent.

B.C. Supreme Court judges also receive $343,000 per year. However, they are appointed and paid for by the federal government and have a different process for compensation.

In its 100-page report, the 2022 Judicial Compensation Committee, found "a startling low level of interest" in the provincial court with fewer people applying to be provincial court judges.

"There is serious difficulty in filling judicial vacancies outside the Lower Mainland," the report said.

The commission described judges' salaries in B.C. as "unreasonably low," more than $25,000 below the national average.

For 2022-23, the average salary of federal and provincial judges across Canada, excluding B.C., was $314,204. The average salary of judges in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario, excluding federal judges, is $343,238, the report said.

Remarks by the Right Honourable Richard Wagner, P.C.
Chief Justice of Canada

(Check against delivery)

Good morning, and thank you for coming. I am pleased to update you this morning on the work of the Supreme Court of Canada, and my responsibilities as Chief Justice of Canada. I always look forward to this opportunity to speak to the media.

It has been another noteworthy year for the Supreme Court. We heard cases on a wide range of issues, from Indigenous rights, to contract law, to Charter rights, and more.

For me, one of the highlights was welcoming a new colleague to the Court, the Honourable Mary T. Moreau. Justice Moreau brings with her a wealth of experience and valuable knowledge, having served for more than 30 years as both a trial judge and as a Chief Justice. Throughout her long career, Justice Moreau has been extensively involved in judicial education, administration and ethics, both in Canada and internationally. My colleagues and I are very happy that she has joined us.

With her appointment, the Supreme Court of Canada has a majority of women judges for the first time in its history.

Those of you who cover the Court regularly may have noticed a few changes, all in the interest of access to justice. The Courtroom is back to full capacity. It is so nice to see the public attending our hearings. It enables them to see how we work. It has also been great to see media attending our hearings, participating in lockups and in briefings. You can do so online or in person.

We found that hybrid hearings worked quite well, so we have continued this practice. Counsel for the parties always have the option to appear in person or online, while interveners must present their views by videoconference. Virtual appearances are efficient and cost-effective for all parties.

Some amendments to the Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada came into force this morning. I want to point out two important changes: First, filing fees have been eliminated. While nominal, the fees added an additional burden for all litigants, particularly those who are self-represented. Eliminating them removes one more barrier to justice.

Secondly, the new rules require using the Court's e-filing portal launched in January 2023. Since its inception, the portal has been a tremendous success. We receive more than 1,000 documents every month through the portal, safely and securely, reducing the administrative burden on parties and on our staff. This is just one example of how we are modernizing. Technology offers great potential to streamline administration and improve access to justice. I salute all those working at courts across the country to identify new solutions.

I want to take a few moments to update you on the work of the Canadian Judicial Council. I chair the CJC, which is the national body that brings together the 44 Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices.

The CJC has experienced a significant turnover in its membership in recent years, which has allowed us to benefit from new perspectives and new ideas. We are counting on an excellent collaboration, and I am convinced that the CJC is well positioned to continue exercising leadership in the administration of justice.

The CJC is working forward on a number of important fronts, such as artificial intelligence. Our members are paying close attention to its potential effects on justice and the courts. The CJC continues to engage with experts in the field, and we are working on developing helpful guidance for the courts.

The CJC is also mindful of the health and well-being of judges. We will therefore be conducting a study on this subject in the very near future. This will allow us to better understand the challenges faced by members of the judiciary, and identify ways we can assist them further. This is important, since health and well-being is a matter for everyone, including judges.

At my press conference last year, I said the judicial conduct regime needed to change. I was very happy to see that soon after, Bill C-9 was finally adopted. The process for reviewing and sanctioning judicial conduct was amended. This was something me and my fellow council members had been calling for, over many years.

Since then, the CJC published new Review Procedures and a new Policy on the Publication of Judicial Conduct Decisions. These developments will promote procedural fairness and provide greater clarity and transparency, while building public trust in our judiciary.

Last year, I also spoke to you about judicial vacancies. This remains a key priority for the Council, and as its chair, I have expressed our concerns to the highest levels of government. I am pleased to see that the number of judicial vacancies has gone down in recent months and I am confident that the government will continue to make efforts to appoint judges in a timely fashion.

Let me share an update on the work of another organization that I chair – the National Judicial Institute.

The NJI has developed continuing education for Canadian judges for over 35 years. Last year, the NJI provided more than 70 national judicial education seminars. The NJI has also embraced digital education, developing a growing library of on-demand resources, available to judges of all courts.

Educational seminars and resources addressed critical topics for Canadian judges, such as sexual assault law, intimate partner violence, justice issues relevant to Indigenous peoples, and the impacts of artificial intelligence on the justice system. The NJI also increased educational programming designed specifically to meet the needs of French-speaking judges across Canada.

The NJI is increasingly solicited by other countries for its expertise in judicial education, and it continues to collaborate with them on capacity building, and judicial reform. A few of those countries include: Ukraine, Vietnam, Singapore, and most recently, Pakistan.

I want to now turn to the work of the Action Committee on Modernizing Court Operations, which I co-chair with the federal Minister of Justice. The Action Committee brings members of the executive and the judiciary together around the same table. It allows chief justices, attorneys general, and court administrators to address challenges from a big picture perspective.

Our legal system is facing several key questions:

> How do we ensure that it is meeting the needs of marginalized Canadians?
>
> How do we ensure adequate funding and resources?
>
> How can technology and collaboration improve access to justice?
> And how do we continue to protect the health and safety of litigants and staff going forward?

The Action Committee has been working to identify best practices and solutions that can help address some of these questions. For instance, we shared a case study showing how family courts in Manitoba tackle backlogs and delays. We developed a roadmap for piloting virtual bail hearings, based on the experience in B.C. We also published a set of best practices for mental health and wellness. I look forward to continuing to build on that progress.

Our court system must function efficiently and effectively, because Canadians rely on it every single day. Courts must have the resources to function effectively. From staffing to infrastructure, our courts need resources to ensure that justice continues to be served.

Governments at all levels must understand that funding for justice initiatives is required to sustain our democracy.

I have said this before, and I will say it again today: public confidence in our courts is essential to maintaining the rule of law and a strong democracy. The Supreme Court of Canada, like all courts across the country in fact, enjoys a great deal of public confidence.

But the judicial system is not immune to problems. In fact, today we are seeing attacks on our judges and our institutions, something we used to only see in other countries.

One of the ongoing challenges is countering disinformation. I would like to say a few words about this. First of all, this challenge is more prevalent than ever, in the era of social media and polarization seen within society, and especially south of the border. People are finding it increasingly difficult to distinguish fact from fiction. And this causes some people, otherwise of good faith, to lose trust in their institutions.

Of course, in a democracy, we accept and even hope that court decisions will be the subject of debate. But it is important for the debates to be respectful and above all, informed. People should at least read judgments before criticizing them.

We can see all kinds of harm caused when court decisions are reported inaccurately, or out of context, for reasons of “sensationalism”.

It is also troubling when the judge is more scrutinized than the judgment itself. It is one thing to express disagreement with a decision, but it is another thing altogether to criticize it because of who the judge is or how they were appointed. Comments like this undermine public confidence in the justice system. We should be especially concerned when elected representatives say these things.

A judiciary that is independent and impartial — and perceived as such — is the pillar of our democracy. At times, it may be useful — even indispensable — for members of society as a whole to come together to denounce and condemn comments of this nature, to correct disinformation and set the record straight. Make no mistake: if we become complacent, we should not be surprised to see the very foundations of the rule of law and our democracy erode.

That is why we need you – the media – more than ever before. These narratives undermine democracies, but quality journalism strengthens trust in our institutions. I emphasized this at a recent conference in Quebec, the Festival international de journalisme de Carleton-sur-Mer. Your work is vital in making our institutions more visible and more accessible. That matters a great deal these days, when there is a lot of wrong and inaccurate information out there.

That is precisely why the Court goes to great lengths to explain our work. Because the public cannot have faith in something it does not understand. If you read our Cases in Brief – and I know many of you do – you will have noticed that we now issue them for oral judgments, in addition to written judgments. This adds to a long list of initiatives put in place in recent years to improve the transparency and accessibility of court hearings and decisions.

I often speak about communication and outreach with the international judicial community. Last month in Brazil, I was the first Canadian Chief Justice to participate in a J20 Summit. The J20 brought together the heads of supreme and constitutional courts of the G20 members, as well as the African Union and the European Union. I was pleased to lead a discussion on access to justice and how courts can better reflect the changing nature of society. This was a great opportunity to share the Canadian experience, as our country is a leader in tackling these issues. I also heard from my counterparts and learned how they are confronting other challenges, like AI and disinformation.

Engaging in this kind of dialogue with other courts around the world is a valuable experience for me and my colleagues. Over the past year, we welcomed delegations from the Supreme Court of the United States and the Constitutional Court of Slovenia for judicial exchanges. We also had our first exchange with the Constitutional Court of South Africa. And we welcomed many other international visitors to the Court – including from countries like Japan, Pakistan, Lithuania, Italy, and Vietnam.

These meetings are unique opportunities to discuss subjects like judicial independence or access to justice and to learn more about how other courts around the world deal with today’s challenges.

My colleagues and I have also, again this year, participated in many meetings with members of the legal community and members of the public across Canada. These meetings are important in creating a better understanding of the Court’s role, but also in getting to know more about the concerns of different stakeholders. They also allow us to learn about many inspiring initiatives.

There is a lot ahead for us this year. We have several initiatives planned to commemorate our 150th anniversary in 2025. I am really looking forward to our regional visits. Members of the Court will go to five different cities during the year. We will meet with students, the general public, the media, and the legal community and tell them about the work of our Court. We will also host a symposium for the legal community, and launch a more modern and accessible website. So, stay tuned!

For now, let me close by saying thank you again for being so interested in the Court and our justice system. I would be happy to answer some of your questions.

Ottawa making progress on judicial appointments but threats to rule of law remain, says chief justice

'The court must have the resources to function effectively' — Chief Justice Robert Wagner

Peter Zimonjic · CBC News · Posted: Jun 03, 2024 4:39 PM EDT | Last Updated: June 3

Supreme Court of Canada Chief Justice Richard Wagner warned that underfunding the justice system and failing to appoint judges in a timely manner threatens the viability of Canada's justice system and could 'jeopardize our democracy and the rule of law.' (The Canadian Press/Adrian Wyld)

Despite some recent progress on appointing more federal judges, Canada's justice system is facing still challenges that threaten to undermine the rule of law, Supreme Court Chief Justice Richard Wagner warned Monday.

Last May, Wagner wrote to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau warning that a chronic shortage of judges was putting "democratic institutions" at risk.

During his annual press conference in Ottawa on Monday, Wagner said the pace of judicial appointments "remains a key priority" but significant progress has been made.

"Since last year, I saw an improvement and I'm confident that the government will follow [up] to try to appoint judges in a timely fashion," he said Monday.

There are 939 federally appointed judges in office, another 256 supernumeraries — retired justices who sit on the bench part time — and 57 vacancies, down from 90 last year.

Wagner said those remaining vacancies, coupled with underfunded provincial court systems and personal attacks on the integrity of judges, threaten both democracy and the rule of law.

- Long delays and collapsed cases are eroding faith in the justice system, lawyers warn
- Justice minister says he's 'proud' of government's record on appointing judges
- Court says Trudeau, justice minister 'failed' Canadians by letting judicial vacancies build up

"The justice system is not a service. It's a need, it's a human need," he said. "People need justice, and when they recognize that they will not have access to justice, that will jeopardize our democracy and the rule of law and we should not underestimate this possibility."

Wagner said that the federal government needs to ensure it appoints federal judges "within a reasonable delay" after a retirement. He would not say how long a reasonable delay should be.

WATCH: Judicial vacancies troubling but progress being made, chief justice says

Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Richard Wagner says he's confident the issue of judicial vacancies can be 'corrected' — though he noted there were still 57 unfilled judge positions across the country, down from almost 90 a year earlier.

The federal government appoints judges to the superior courts and courts of appeal in each province, the Federal Court, the Tax Court and the Supreme Court.

Justice Minister Arif Virani sent a letter to Wagner last week saying that he has appointed 113 federal judges since his elevation to the portfolio last July.

'One stay of proceedings is one too many'

In July 2016, the Supreme Court of Canada set out rules to decide how long is too long for a criminal trial. That decision in R. v. Jordan established that criminal cases that go beyond those time limits — 18 months for provincial courts and 30 months for superior courts — can be stayed for unreasonable delays.

"One stay of proceedings is one too many, let's be clear on that," Wagner said Monday. "The problem is that in some provinces there is not enough funding, there are not enough judges so that an accused cannot have his or her trial within a reasonable delay."

Wagner said the Jordan ruling is a consequence of a lack of funding for the justice system and those deadlines should not be extended to prevent stays in criminal trials. Instead, he said, the justice system should be supported properly.

"Jordan is the law and we should obey the law," he said. "I think it would be unreasonable to believe that, in a society like ours, that an accused should wait more than three years to have his trial."

More provincial funding needed: Wagner

Wagner said that because the administration of justice is mostly a provincial responsibility, governments across the country should properly fund their own systems.

"The court must have the resources to function effectively, from staffing to infrastructure. Our courts need resources to ensure that justice continues to to be served," he said.

Wagner said that in British Columbia and Ontario — where the cost of living is higher — it has been difficult to attract candidates to become judges because salaries and working conditions make the job unattractive.

- In Quebec's north, criminal cases are being dropped because of a drastic lack of resources
- Number of cases tossed due to delays hits all-time high in N.S. courts

"The conditions for the judge working on the bench these days is very difficult. In most provinces they don't have enough support in terms of assistants, in terms of technology," he said.

Wagner said it is widely known in some provinces that lawyers will refuse to apply to be a judge because of the lack of support.

"Those responsibilities come to the provincial governments, to make sure that they provide enough support, enough funding, enough technology," he said.

WATCH: Faith in justice system at risk if too many cases are stayed, chief justice says

Too many cases stayed due to delays could cause people to lose faith in the justice system — which could pose a major threat to democracy, says Supreme Court Chief Justice Richard Wagner.

Wagner said the public's trust in the justice system is essential to a "healthy democracy" and Canada is "not immune to all changes."

"Today we are witnessing attacks on our judges and our institutions, something that we used to only see abroad," he said.

Wagner said people in general are not reading judgments from the courts before criticizing them and judges themselves are often scrutinized more closely than their rulings.

- Quebec government says new powers for justices of the peace will reduce court delays
- Double-booked courtroom, Crown delays lead to Ontario sex assault case being thrown out

"It is one thing to disagree with a decision, but it is another thing altogether to criticize it because of who the judge is, or how they were appointed," he said.

"Comments like this undermine public confidence in the justice system. We should be especially concerned when elected representatives say these things."

Highlights

January 2006: budgetary surplus of $1.7 billion

There was a budgetary surplus of $1.7 billion in January 2006, down $0.7 billion from January 2005. Total budgetary revenues rose $1.3 billion, reflecting solid growth in all major tax streams. Program expenses were up $2.2 billion, reflecting the impact of $0.8 billion in assistance for grain and oilseed producers and $0.6 billion related to the Energy Cost Benefit. Public debt charges were $0.2 billion lower.

April 2005 to January 2006: budgetary surplus of $9.0 billion

For the first 10 months of the 2005–06 fiscal year (April to January), the budgetary surplus is estimated at $9.0 billion, down $3.9 billion from the $12.9-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05. Budgetary revenues were up $6.5 billion or 4.1 per cent. This gain is net of the $4.0-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures announced in the November 2005 Economic and Fiscal Update pertaining to the 2005 tax year. Program expenses were up $11.1 billion or 9.5 per cent, primarily due to higher transfers to the provinces and territories for health care and equalization/Territorial Formula Financing (TFF). Public debt charges were $0.7 billion lower.

January 2006

There was a budgetary surplus of $1.7 billion in January 2006, down $0.7 billion from January 2005.

Budgetary revenues rose $1.3 billion or 6.9 per cent to $20.2 billion.

- Personal income tax receipts were up $1.0 billion or 11.5 per cent, primarily due to stronger source deductions from employment income.
- Corporate income tax revenues rose $0.2 billion or 10.2 per cent, reflecting ongoing profitability in the corporate sector.
- Other income tax receipts—withholdings from non-residents—rose 14.7 per cent.
- Excise taxes and duties rose $0.2 billion or 5.3 per cent, largely due to a $0.2-billion or 7.1-per-cent increase in goods and services tax (GST) revenues. Customs import duties were up $52 million, while sales and excise taxes were down $49 million. Revenues from the Air Travellers Security Charge were down $6 million.
- Employment insurance (EI) premiums declined by 11.3 per cent, reflecting the decline in the premium rate from $1.95 to $1.87 per $100 of insurable earnings, effective January 1, 2006.

- Other revenues, consisting of revenues from Crown corporations, sales of goods and services and foreign exchange revenues, were down 3.0 per cent. Other revenues can be volatile on a monthly basis.

Program expenses in January 2006 were $15.8 billion, up $2.2 billion or 15.8 per cent from January 2005.

Transfer payments were up $1.5 billion or 18.1 per cent.

- Major transfers to persons, consisting of elderly and EI benefits, were up $84 million or 2.1 per cent. Elderly benefits increased 5.5 per cent due to both higher average benefits, which are indexed to Consumer Price Index inflation, and an increase in the number of individuals eligible for benefits. EI benefit payments decreased 2.8 per cent, reflecting a decline in regular benefits.
- Major transfers to other levels of government, consisting of federal transfers in support of health and other social programs (Canada Health Transfer and Canada Social Transfer), fiscal transfers, transfers to provinces on behalf of Canada's cities and communities, and Alternative Payments for Standing Programs, were up $0.5 billion or 20.6 per cent. The increase in federal transfers in support of health and other social programs and higher fiscal transfers largely reflect increased funding under the 2004 agreements on health care and equalization/TFF.
- Subsidies and other transfers increased by $0.9 billion or 46.7 per cent, largely reflecting transfers under the Grains and Oilseeds Payment Program (Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada) and the Energy Cost Benefit (Canada Revenue Agency and Human Resources and Social Development).

Other program expenses consist of transfers to Crown corporations, operating expenses for departments and agencies including National Defence, and the ongoing assessment of the Government's liabilities. These expenses increased by $0.6 billion or 12.0 per cent.

Public debt charges decreased by $0.2 billion or 6.3 per cent due to a decrease in the average effective interest rate on the debt.

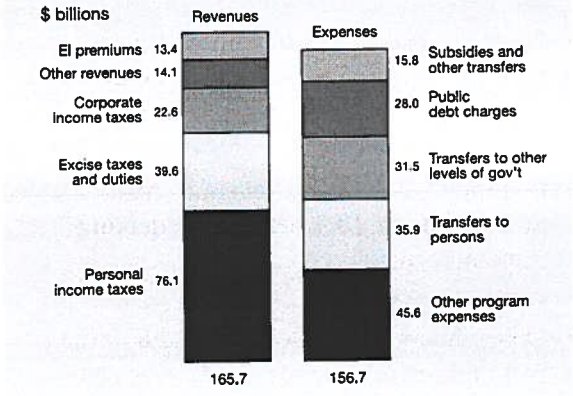
April 2005 to January 2006

In the first 10 months of the 2005–06 fiscal year, there was a budgetary surplus of $9.0 billion, $3.9 billion below the $12.9-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05.

Budgetary revenues were up $6.5 billion or 4.1 per cent to $165.7 billion.

- Personal income tax revenues rose $3.0 billion or 4.1 per cent. This gain is net of the $4.0-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures announced in the November 2005 Economic and Fiscal Update pertaining to the 2005 tax year.
- Corporate income tax revenues were up $2.7 billion or 13.7 per cent, reflecting gains in corporate profitability in 2005.

Revenues and expenses
(April 2005-January 2006)



- Other income tax revenues increased by $1.0 billion or 34.9 per cent, reflecting increased dividend payments to non-residents.
- Excise taxes and duties rose $1.9 billion or 5.1 per cent. GST revenues increased $1.8 billion or 6.8 per cent, broadly consistent with the growth rate of retail sales of 6.6 per cent over the same period. Customs import duties were up 12.9 per cent. Sales and excise taxes were down 2.1 per cent, while the Air Travellers Security Charge was down 14.2 per cent, reflecting reductions in the charge effective April 1, 2005.
- EI premiums were down 1.6 per cent, as the impact of the reduction in the premium rate in January 2005 more than offset the impact of higher employment and wages and salaries.
- Other revenues were down $1.9 billion or 16.0 per cent, reflecting the impact of the one-time gain ($2.6 billion) from the sale of the Government's remaining shares in Petro-Canada in September 2004.

Program expenses in the April 2005 to January 2006 period were $128.7 billion, up $11.1 billion or 9.5 per cent over the same period of 2004–05, with most of the increase attributable to higher transfers to provinces and territories for health care and equalization/TFF. Public debt charges declined by $0.7 billion.

Transfer payments, which account for nearly two-thirds of total program expenses, increased by $8.7 billion or 11.7 per cent.

- Transfers to persons advanced by 2.1 per cent. Elderly benefits were up 4.3 per cent while EI benefits were down 2.2 per cent. The year-to-date decline in EI benefits is mainly attributable to a decline in regular benefits, which is in turn due to improved labour market conditions compared to the same period in 2004–05.
- Transfers to other levels of government were up $6.0 billion or 23.5 per cent, reflecting the impact of the 2004 agreement on health care and the new framework for equalization and TFF.

Budgetary balance

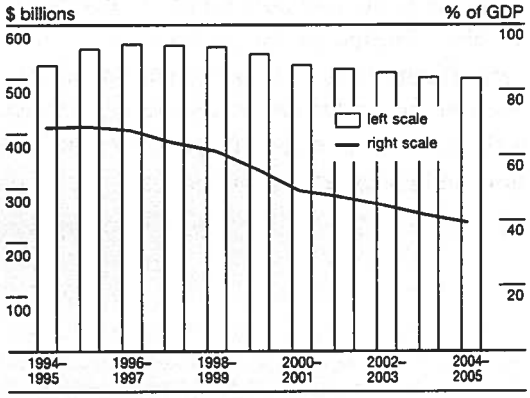
Federal debt (accumulated deficit)



Sources: Department of Finance Canada and Statistics Canada.

- Subsidies and other transfers increased by 14.7 per cent, reflecting the impact of measures from recent budgets as well as transfers under the Grains and Oilseeds Payment Program and the Energy Cost Benefit.

Other program expenses increased by 5.6 per cent.

Public debt charges were down 2.5 per cent due to a decline in the stock of interest-bearing debt and a decline in the average effective interest rate on that debt.

Financial source of $3.8 billion for April 2005 to January 2006

The budgetary balance is presented on a full accrual basis of accounting, recording government assets and liabilities when they are receivable or incurred, regardless of when the cash is received or paid. In contrast, the financial source/requirement measures the difference between cash coming in to the Government and cash going out. This measure is affected not only by changes in the budgetary balance but also by the cash source/requirement resulting from the Government's investing activities through its acquisition of capital assets and its loans, financial investments and advances, as well as from other activities, including payment of accounts payable and collection of accounts receivable, foreign exchange activities, and the amortization of its tangible capital assets. The difference between the budgetary balance and financial source/requirement is recorded in non-budgetary transactions.

Non-budgetary transactions resulted in a net requirement of $5.2 billion in the April-to-January period, up $0.2 billion from the requirement in the same period of 2004–05.

With a budgetary surplus of $9.0 billion and a net requirement of $5.2 billion from non-budgetary transactions, there was a financial source of $3.8 billion in the first 10 months of 2005–06 compared to a financial source of $7.9 billion in the same period of 2004–05.

Net financing activities down $18.2 billion

The Government used this financial source of $3.8 billion and a reduction in its cash balances of $14.4 billion to reduce its market debt by $18.2 billion by the end of January 2006, largely through a reduction of marketable bonds and treasury bills. The level of cash balances varies from month to month based on a number of factors including periodic large debt maturities, which can be quite volatile on a monthly basis. Cash balances at the end of January stood at $2.7 billion.

Highlights

February 2006: budgetary surplus of $4.1 billion

There was a budgetary surplus of $4.1 billion in February 2006, down $1.7 billion from February 2005. Total budgetary revenues were $0.1 billion lower, primarily due to a $0.6-billion decline in corporate income tax revenues. This decline is primarily due to an increase in refunds to the non-energy manufacturing sector. Program expenses were up $1.6 billion, primarily reflecting higher transfer payments to the provinces and territories as specified under the 2004 agreements on health care and equalization/Territorial Formula Financing (TFF). Public debt charges were flat compared to the same month last year.

April 2005 to February 2006: budgetary surplus of $13.1 billion

For the first 11 months of the 2005–06 fiscal year (April to February), the budgetary surplus is estimated at $13.1 billion, down $5.6 billion from the $18.7-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05. Budgetary revenues were up $6.4 billion or 3.6 per cent. This gain is net of the $4.7-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures pertaining to the 2005 tax year and the first two months of this year. Program expenses were up $12.7 billion or 9.9 per cent, primarily due to higher transfers to the provinces and territories for health care and equalization/TFF. Public debt charges were $0.7 billion lower. A full update of the fiscal projections for the year as a whole, including the year-end accrual adjustments, will be provided in the budget.

February 2006

There was a budgetary surplus of $4.1 billion in February 2006, down $1.7 billion from February 2005.

Budgetary revenues declined by $0.1 billion, or 0.5 per cent, to $19.7 billion.

- Personal income tax receipts were up $0.3 billion or 4.7 per cent.
- Corporate income tax revenues were down $0.6 billion or 9.6 per cent, largely due to an increase in refunds to the non-energy manufacturing sector, reflecting weak profitability in that sector in 2005. In addition, corporate year-end settlement payments were weaker than in February last year, due in part to lower settlement payments from the non-energy manufacturing sector.
- Other income tax receipts—withholdings from non-residents—rose $59 million or 16.8 per cent in February.
- Excise taxes and duties rose $0.2 billion or 5.0 per cent due to a $0.3-billion increase in goods and services tax (GST) revenues. Customs import duties were down $38 million, while sales and excise taxes were down $78 million. Revenues from the Air Travellers Security Charge were up $5 million.

- Employment insurance (EI) premiums declined by 4.8 per cent, reflecting the decline in the premium rate from $1.95 to $1.87 per $100 of insurable earnings, effective January 1, 2006.
- Other revenues, consisting of revenues from Crown corporations, sales of goods and services, return on investments, foreign exchange revenues and miscellaneous revenues, were down 3.7 per cent. Other revenues can be volatile on a monthly basis.

Program expenses in February 2006 were $12.9 billion, up $1.6 billion or 13.9 per cent from February 2005, primarily due to higher transfer payments.

Transfer payments were up $1.3 billion or 16.0 per cent.

- Transfers to persons, consisting of elderly and EI benefits, were up $61 million or 1.6 per cent. Elderly benefits increased 5.4 per cent due to both higher average benefits, which are indexed to Consumer Price Index inflation, and an increase in the number of individuals eligible for benefits. EI benefit payments decreased 4.8 per cent, reflecting a decline in regular benefits.
- Transfers to other levels of government, consisting of federal transfers in support of health and other social programs (Canada Health Transfer and Canada Social Transfer), fiscal transfers, transfers to provinces on behalf of Canada's cities and communities, and Alternative Payments for Standing Programs, were up $0.8 billion or 35.3 per cent. The increase in federal transfers in support of health and other social programs and higher fiscal transfers largely reflect increased funding under the 2004 agreements on health care and equalization/TFF.
- Subsidies and other transfers increased $0.4 billion or 21.9 per cent. This component is volatile on a monthly basis.

Other program expenses consist of transfers to Crown corporations and operating expenses for departments and agencies, including National Defence, and also reflect the ongoing assessment of the Government's liabilities. These expenses increased $0.3 billion or 9.4 per cent.

Public debt charges increased marginally, by $9 million.

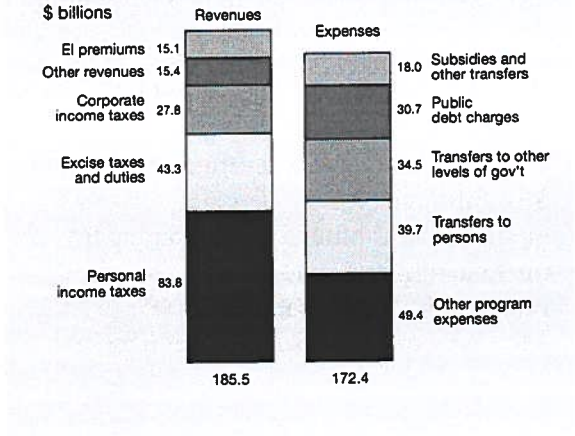
April 2005 to February 2006

In the first 11 months of the 2005–06 fiscal year, there was a budgetary surplus of $13.1 billion, $5.6 billion below the $18.7-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05.

Budgetary revenues increased $6.4 billion or 3.6 per cent to $185.5 billion.

- Personal income tax revenues rose $3.4 billion or 4.2 per cent. This gain is net of the $4.7-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures pertaining to the 2005 tax year and the first two months of this year.
- Corporate income tax revenues were up $2.2 billion or 8.4 per cent, reflecting gains in corporate profitability in 2005.

Revenues and expenses
(April 2005-February 2006)



- Other income tax revenues increased $1.1 billion or 32.9 per cent, reflecting increased dividend payments to non-residents.
- Excise taxes and duties rose $2.1 billion or 5.1 per cent. GST revenues increased $2.1 billion or 7.2 per cent, broadly consistent with the growth rate of retail sales of 6.9 per cent over the same period. Customs import duties were up 10.3 per cent. Sales and excise taxes were down 2.8 per cent, while the Air Travellers Security Charge was down 11.2 per cent, reflecting reductions in the charge, effective April 1, 2005.
- EI premiums were down 2.0 per cent, as the impact of the reduction in the premium rate in January 2005 and January 2006 more than offset the impact of higher employment and wages and salaries.
- Other revenues were down $2.0 billion or 15.1 per cent, reflecting the impact of the one-time gain ($2.6 billion) from the sale of the Government's remaining shares in Petro-Canada in September 2004.

Program expenses in the April 2005 to February 2006 period were $141.7 billion, up $12.7 billion or 9.9 per cent from the same period of 2004–05, primarily due to higher transfers to the provinces and territories for health care and equalization/TFF. Public debt charges declined by $0.7 billion.

Transfer payments, which account for nearly two-thirds of total program expenses, increased $10.0 billion or 12.2 per cent.

- Transfers to persons advanced by 2.0 per cent. Elderly benefits were up 4.4 per cent while EI benefits were down 2.5 per cent. The year-to-date decline in EI benefits is mainly attributable to a decline in regular benefits, which is in turn due to improved labour market conditions compared to the same period in 2004–05.
- Transfers to other levels of government were up $6.8 billion or 24.5 per cent, reflecting the impact of the 2004 agreements on health care and the new framework for equalization and TFF.

Budgetary balance

- Subsidies and other transfers increased 15.6 per cent, reflecting the impact of measures from recent budgets as well as transfers under the Grains and Oilseeds Payment Program and the Energy Cost Benefit.

Other program expenses increased 5.8 per cent.

Public debt charges were down 2.3 per cent compared to the same period last year, due to a decline in the stock of interest-bearing debt and a decline in the average effective interest rate on that debt.

Financial source of $5.4 billion for April 2005 to February 2006

The budgetary balance is presented on a full accrual basis of accounting, recording government assets and liabilities when they are receivable or incurred, regardless of when the cash is received or paid. In contrast, the financial source/requirement measures the difference between cash coming in to the Government and cash going out. This measure is affected not only by changes in the budgetary balance but also by the cash source/requirement resulting from the Government's investing activities through its acquisition of capital assets and its loans, financial investments and advances, as well as from other activities, including payment of accounts payable and collection of accounts receivable, foreign exchange activities, and the amortization of its tangible capital assets. The difference between the budgetary balance and financial source/requirement is recorded in non-budgetary transactions.

Non-budgetary transactions resulted in a net requirement of $7.6 billion in the April-to-February period, down $2.6 billion from the requirement in the same period of 2004–05.

With a budgetary surplus of $13.1 billion and a net requirement of $7.6 billion from non-budgetary transactions, there was a financial source of $5.4 billion in the first 11 months of 2005–06 compared to a financial source of $8.5 billion in the same period of 2004–05.

Net financing activities down $18.5 billion

The Government used this financial source of $5.4 billion and a reduction in its cash balances of $13.1 billion to reduce its market debt by $18.5 billion by the end of February 2006, largely through a reduction of marketable bonds and treasury bills. The level of cash balances varies from month to month based on a number of factors including periodic large debt maturities, which can be quite volatile on a monthly basis. Cash balances at the end of February stood at $4.0 billion.

Highlights

March 2006: budgetary deficit of $1.1 billion

There was a budgetary deficit of $1.1 billion in March 2006, down from the $9.9-billion deficit recorded in March 2005. The improvement is almost entirely due to lower program expenses resulting from lower transfer payments, reflecting $7.2 billion in one-time transfers and adjustments recorded in March 2005 related to the federal-provincial-territorial agreements on health care and Equalization/Territorial Formula Financing (TFF). Program expenses were down $8.4 billion in March. Budgetary revenues were $0.8 billion higher, reflecting solid growth in personal income tax revenues and an increase in non-tax revenues, partially offset by declines in corporate income tax and goods and services tax (GST) revenues. Public debt charges were up $0.3 billion compared to the same month last year.

April 2005 to March 2006: budgetary surplus of $8.4 billion, net of anticipated costs related to Bill C-48

For the April 2005 to March 2006 period, the budgetary surplus is estimated at $12.0 billion, up $3.3 billion from the $8.8-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05. Budgetary revenues were up $7.2 billion, or 3.6 per cent. This gain is net of the $5.0-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures pertaining to the 2005 tax year and the first quarter of 2006. Program expenses were up $4.3 billion, or 2.8 per cent, primarily due to higher operating expenses for National Defence and other departments and agencies. Public debt charges were $0.4 billion lower.

The April 2005 to March 2006 monthly results are not the final results for the year as a whole. They do not account for $3.6 billion in costs related to anticipated payments made under Bill C-48 for 2005–06. After adjusting for these payments, the April to March surplus is $8.4 billion. Nor do the results reflect the regular end-of-year accounting adjustments, which include final tax accrual adjustments as well as final estimates of the cost of liabilities incurred during the fiscal year.

A discussion of the impact of the March results on the budget forecast for 2005–06 is provided later in this document.

Note to Readers:
Budget 2006 was presented on a gross reporting basis, whereas The Fiscal Monitor for March 2006 is presented on a net basis. Beginning with the April 2006 monthly financial results, The Fiscal Monitor will also report the monthly financial results on a gross basis. A reconciliation table is provided later in this document showing the monthly results for the April 2005 to March 2006 period on a gross reporting basis, consistent with the Budget 2006 presentation.

The Fiscal Monitor

March 2006

There was a budgetary deficit of $1.1 billion in March 2006, down $8.9 billion from the $9.9-billion deficit recorded in March 2005.

Budgetary revenues rose $0.8 billion, or 4.3 per cent, to $18.6 billion.

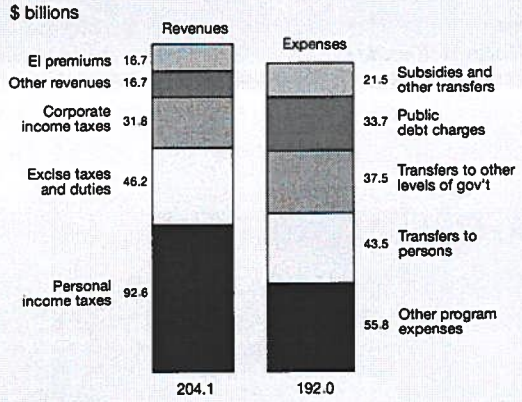
- Personal income tax revenues were up $0.5 billion, or 6.3 per cent.
- Corporate income tax revenues were down $0.2 billion, or 4.6 per cent, reflecting weaker corporate year-end settlement payments from the refining and non-energy manufacturing sectors.
- Other income tax revenues—withholdings from non-residents—rose $34 million, or 10.8 per cent.
- Excise taxes and duties were down $0.1 billion, or 4.1 per cent, due to a $0.2-billion decline in GST revenues. Customs import duties were up $87 million, sales and excise taxes rose $35 million and revenues from the Air Travellers Security Charge were up $2 million.
- Employment insurance (EI) premiums declined by 6.3 per cent, reflecting the decline in the premium rate from $1.95 to $1.87 per $100 of insurable earnings, effective January 1, 2006.
- Other revenues consist of net profits from enterprise Crown corporations, sales of goods and services, returns on investments, foreign exchange revenues and miscellaneous revenues. Other revenues, which are volatile on a monthly basis, were up $0.6 billion.

Program expenses in March 2006 were $16.7 billion, down $8.4 billion, or 33.6 per cent, from March 2005, primarily reflecting lower transfer payments.

Transfer payments were down $8.3 billion, or 44.8 per cent.

- Transfers to persons, consisting of elderly and EI benefits, were up $103 million, or 2.8 per cent. Elderly benefits increased 6.2 per cent due to both higher average benefits, which are indexed to Consumer Price Index inflation, and an increase in the number of individuals eligible for benefits. EI benefit payments decreased 3.3 per cent, reflecting a decline in regular benefits.
- Transfers to other levels of government, consisting of federal transfers in support of health and other social programs (Canada Health Transfer and Canada Social Transfer), fiscal transfers, transfers to provinces on behalf of Canada's cities and communities, and Alternative Payments for Standing Programs, were down $7.2 billion, or 70.2 per cent. The decrease in federal transfers in support of health and other social programs and lower fiscal transfers reflect one-time transfers and adjustments under the 2004 agreements on health care and Equalization/TFF recorded in March 2005.

Revenues and expenses
(April 2005-March 2006)



- Subsidies and other transfers decreased by $1.3 billion, or 26.9 per cent. This component is volatile on a monthly basis.

Other program expenses consist of transfers to Crown corporations and operating expenses for departments and agencies, including National Defence, and also reflect the ongoing assessment of the Government's liabilities. Consistent with the announcement in Budget 2006, this category now also includes the net expenses of foundations. On a year-over-year basis, other program expenses decreased $0.1 billion, or 1.3 per cent.

Public debt charges increased $0.3 billion, or 11.8 per cent, due to an increase in the average effective interest rate on the debt.

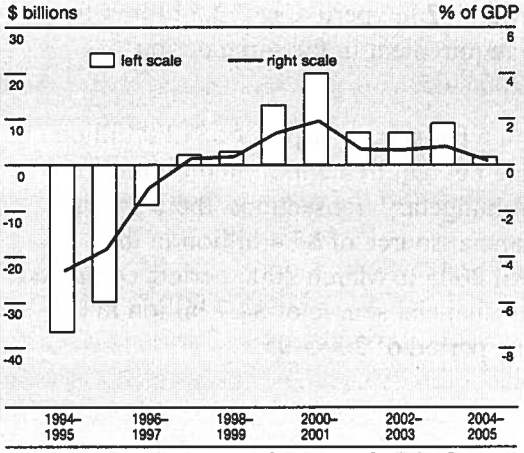
April 2005 to March 2006

For the April 2005 to March 2006 period, there was a budgetary surplus of $12.0 billion, $3.3 billion higher than the $8.8-billion surplus reported in the same period of 2004–05.

Budgetary revenues rose $7.2 billion, or 3.6 per cent, to $204.1 billion.

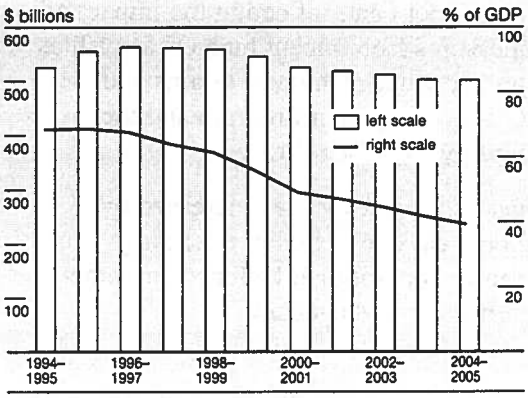
- Personal income tax revenues rose $3.9 billion, or 4.4 per cent. This gain is net of the $5.0-billion cost of the personal income tax reduction measures pertaining to the 2005 tax year and the first quarter of 2006.
- Corporate income tax revenues were up $2.0 billion, or 6.6 per cent, reflecting gains in corporate profitability in 2005.
- Other income tax revenues increased by $1.1 billion, or 31.0 per cent, reflecting increased dividend payments to non-residents.
- Excise taxes and duties rose $2.0 billion, or 4.5 per cent. GST revenues increased $1.9 billion, or 6.0 per cent, broadly consistent with growth in retail sales of 6.7 per cent over the comparable period. Customs import duties were up 12.4 per cent. Sales and excise taxes were down 2.2 per cent, while the Air Travellers Security Charge was down 9.8 per cent, reflecting reductions in the charge, effective April 1, 2005.

Budgetary balance



Sources: Department of Finance Canada and Statistics Canada.

Federal debt (accumulated deficit)



Sources: Department of Finance Canada and Statistics Canada.

- EI premiums were down 2.5 per cent, as the impact of the reductions in premium rates in January 2005 and January 2006 more than offset the impact of higher employment and wages and salaries.
- Other revenues were down $1.3 billion, or 10.0 per cent, reflecting the impact of the one-time gain ($2.6 billion) from the sale of the Government's remaining shares in Petro-Canada in September 2004.

Program expenses in the April 2005 to March 2006 period were $158.3 billion, up $4.3 billion, or 2.8 per cent, over the same period of 2004–05. Public debt charges declined by $0.4 billion. Transfer payments, which account for over half of program expenses, increased by $1.7 billion, or 1.6 per cent.

- Transfers to persons advanced by 2.1 per cent. Elderly benefits were up 4.5 per cent while EI benefits were down 2.6 per cent. The year-to-date decline in EI benefits is mainly attributable to a decline in regular benefits, which is in turn due to improved labour market conditions compared to the same period in 2004–05.
- Transfers to other levels of government were down $0.5 billion, or 1.3 per cent.
- Subsidies and other transfers increased by 6.2 per cent, reflecting the impact of measures from recent budgets as well as transfers under the new Grains and Oilseeds Payment Program and the Energy Cost Benefit.

Other program expenses increased by 5.0 per cent due to higher operating expenses for National Defence and other departments and agencies.

Public debt charges were down 1.2 per cent due to a decline in the stock of interest-bearing debt and a decline in the average effective interest rate on that debt.

Financial source of $5.4 billion for April 2005 to March 2006

The budgetary balance is presented on a full accrual basis of accounting, recording government assets and liabilities when they are receivable or incurred, regardless of when the cash is received or paid. In contrast, the financial source/requirement measures the difference between cash coming in to the Government and cash going out. This measure is affected not only by changes in the budgetary balance but also by the cash source/requirement resulting from the Government's investing activities through its acquisition of capital assets and its loans, financial investments and advances, as well as from other activities, including payment of accounts payable and collection of accounts receivable, foreign exchange activities, and the amortization of its tangible capital assets. The difference between the budgetary balance and financial source/requirement is recorded in non-budgetary transactions.

Non-budgetary transactions resulted in a net requirement of $6.6 billion in the April 2005 to March 2006 period, up $2.5 billion from the requirement in the same period of 2004–05.

With a budgetary surplus of $12.0 billion and a net requirement of $6.6 billion from non-budgetary transactions, there was a financial source of $5.4 billion in the April 2005 to March 2006 period, compared to a financial source of $4.7 billion in the same period of 2004–05.

Net financing activities down $4.6 billion

The Government used this financial source of $5.4 billion to increase its cash balances by $0.8 billion and to reduce its market debt by $4.6 billion by the end of March 2006, largely through a reduction of marketable bonds. The level of cash balances varies from month to month based on a number of factors including periodic large debt maturities, which can be quite volatile on a monthly basis. Cash balances at the end of March stood at $17.9 billion.

The Fiscal Monitor

Quarterly update of the fiscal outlook for 2005–06: estimated outcome for 2005–06 unchanged from budget, with a projected budgetary surplus of $8.0 billion

The monthly results for the 12-month period ended March 2006 are consistent with the forecast presented in the 2006 budget, which was prepared based on monthly financial information through February 2006. However, March data show that both corporate income tax revenues and direct program expenses came in lower than expected.

Corporate income tax revenues in March 2006 were weaker than expected due to lower than anticipated settlement payments from the energy sector. Corporations make monthly tax instalment payments based on either their previous year's actual tax liability or their current year's estimated liability, with any differences made up within 60 days of the close of their taxation year. As roughly three-quarters of Canadian corporations have corporate year-ends in September through December, most corporate settlement payments are received in January through March. As such, the magnitude of corporate receipts in March is very volatile. However, the final result for corporate income tax receipts for 2005–06 will likely be higher than reported in the April to March period. Positive year-end accrual adjustments are generally recorded in the corporate tax stream. This reflects the fact that no adjustments are made to the monthly corporate data for payables and receivables due to a lack of reliable information on which to base such adjustments.

The shortfall in corporate income tax revenues was offset by lower than projected direct program expenses, as it appears that the dissolution of Parliament in November lowered program expenses by more than anticipated in the budget forecast.

All told, the year-to-date results are consistent with the budget forecast of a surplus of $8.0 billion for 2005–06.

The above results are not the final results for the year as a whole.

- The April 2005 to March 2006 monthly results do not account for $3.6 billion in costs related to anticipated payments made under Bill C-48 for 2005–06, yielding a surplus estimate of $8.4 billion.
- Nor do the results reflect the regular end-of-year accounting adjustments, which include final tax accrual adjustments as well as final estimates of the cost of liabilities incurred during the fiscal year.
- While the monthly results include estimates of tax accruals, the final accruals can vary significantly from the monthly estimates due to factors such as the magnitude of registered retirement savings plan contributions and variations in capital gains and losses reported at tax filing. Final accrual estimates will be determined based on assessments of tax files as at May 31.
- Similarly, while the monthly results attempt to reflect the most up-to-date information on the Government's legal and environmental liabilities, provisions for guarantees, and allowances for valuation of loans, investments and advances, these are ultimately determined when the books are closed for the year, generally in September.

Differences between net and gross reporting

The revenues and expenses in Tables 1–6 are presented on a "net" basis, with certain expenses netted against budgetary revenues and certain revenues netted against expenses: the Canada Child Tax Benefit is netted against personal income tax revenues; departmental revenues that are levied for specific purposes, such as the contract costs of policing services in provinces, are netted against expenses; and revenues of consolidated Crown corporations and other entities are netted against their total expenses. This classification has the effect of reducing both revenues and expenses but has no impact on the budgetary balance. The following table shows the impact of "grossing up" budgetary revenues and expenses for these adjustments. Beginning with the April 2006 monthly financial results, The Fiscal Monitor will be presented on a gross basis, consistent with the presentation in Budget 2006.

Preface

The Fiscal Reference Tables provide annual data on the financial position of the federal, provincial-territorial and local governments. The data are presented on both a Public Accounts basis—corresponding to the accounting conventions used to report financial information to the respective legislatures—as well as on a National Accounts basis—as prepared by Statistics Canada and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

For information or clarification, please contact Douglas Nevison at 613-995-6391, Fiscal Policy Division, Department of Finance, Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0G5.

[1] In 1996-97, the Canada Health and Social Transfer (CHST) was introduced to replace the Canada Assistance Plan, education support, and insurance and medical care. Since April 2004, the CHST has been divided into the Canada Health Transfer and the Canada Social Transfer.

[2] Certain comparative figures have been reclassified to conform to the current year's presentation.

Due to a break in the series following the introduction of full accrual accounting, data from 1983-84 onward are not directly comparable with earlier years.
